The reason I asked that the previous question be voted down was because I do not think the question as submitted by the Speaker clearly and fully presents the true issue to the House. I think the issue is not whether this is in order on one day or another day. The true issue before the House is whether the bill presented by the gentleman from Indiana is in order to-day. I therefore move to amend the proposition submitted by the Chair so that it will read as follows:

Is the bill called up by the gentleman from Indiana in order to-day?

I stop right there. We are not asking any man to give any reasons in this decision as to why he thinks it is in order or why he does not. If you adopt the amendment that I offer you present the clear issue to the House as to whether the proposition offered by the gentleman from Indiana is in order to-day; not whether it was in order yesterday, or going to be in order next week. I therefore hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DALZELL. In capital letters.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offers it by way of a substitute?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I offer it by way of a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama offers the following as a substitute for the proposition.

Mr. KEIFER. Let me suggest that the word "resolution" should go in instead of the word "bill."

The SPEAKER. The word "bill" is a generic one, and would cover the resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will change it and make it "joint resolution." I merely want to present the question to the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. As many as favor agreeing to the proposition, will say "aye." [The affirmative vote was taken.] Opposed, "no." [The negative vote was taken.] The ayes seem to have it——

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, let me make a parliamentary inquiry. I did not hear the Speaker's voice. What is the vote upon? What is the question?

The SPEAKER. This substitute has been agreed to by way of amendment to the proposition submitted to the House, on which the House refused to order the previous question.

Mr. TAWNEY. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Then the parliamentary situation——

Mr. BUTLER. At the proper time I desire to demand the yeas and nays, if I can learn when that time is.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the substitute been read at the Clerk's desk?

The SPEAKER. It has been read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HAY. I do not think it ever was read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. It was read by the Clerk.

Mr. OLMSTED. I ask unanimous consent that it be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Since the substitute was read to the House at the Clerk's desk it has been changed, not in substance, but in words, by striking out the word "bill" and putting in the words "joint resolution," and the Clerk will again read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Is the House joint resolution called up by the gentleman from Indiana in order now?

The SPEAKER. This is offered by way of amendment as a substitute.

Mr. BUTLER. Is the question upon the adoption of the substitute?

Mr. DALZELL. Has "now" been substituted for "to-day?"

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. DALZELL. In large letters, I hope.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, in view of the sarcasm of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], I desire to say a word before the motion is voted on.

The SPEAKER. The House is dividing, but the gentleman may be recognized by unanimous consent. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Three or four minutes, or five.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may be heard for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not wish to be put in the attitude of voting one day that the Constitution controls and another day that it does not; and in view of the facetious remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] I have asked for an opportunity, as every other Member ought to have an opportunity, on this transcendently important question, to state the reasons for my vote. As I understand it, the precedents which have been cited to show that this bill is constitutionally privileged are all precedents holding that a bill providing for the taking of the census, the original bill, is privileged under the Constitution. As I understand it, there is no precedent declaring that any bill providing any sort of amendment which the Census Committee may suggest would have this high constitutional privilege.

We have already passed a law which would, if carried into effect, take the national census in accordance with the mandate of the Constitution, a complete census.

The committee have brought in a joint resolution which provides some additional details, but the provision of the Constitution for taking a national census has already been provided for in the law which Congress passed and which has been signed by the President.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In a moment. Now, I do not understand that any amendment which may be brought in here to amend that law would be of the highest constitutional privilege.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is exactly what Speaker Henderson held.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not say this except with a feeling of entire respect, but upon the question of constitutional construction, decided by Speaker Henderson, and which under my oath does not appeal to my judgment, I am not bound to vote to sustain it.

I have as much responsibility under my oath as a national Representative to observe the Constitution of the United States as the Speaker had when he rendered his decision.

As I said, we have passed a law to take the census under the requirements of the Constitution. Now, suppose the Committee on the Census had brought in a bill to amend that law by increasing the salary of the Director of the Census. That would relate to the census, and it would be an amendment of this census law. Would that be a question of high constitutional privilege? Is there no discrimination to be exercised in our determination as to whether a joint resolution, brought in to amend the census law passed to carry out the mandate of the Constitution, is or is not constitutionally privileged? Are we bound absolutely to hold that anything a committee may suggest, to increase or reduce a salary or to add to the number of officers who are to take the census, is a matter of constitutional privilege? The law on the statute book which would carry out completely the mandate of the Constitution to take the national census has been passed, and they propose a few additional details, not at all necessary, to the taking of the census. Does that present a question of high constitutional privilege? I shall vote that it does not.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not wish to cut off debate on this proposition if the membership of the House want to indulge in it.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire five minutes for the purpose of debate, but I desire a portion of that time to give the House certain information contrary to the statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, who has just taken his seat, as to the status of the present matter under consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin to say that there were no precedents holding a bill supplemental to the original census bill as being privileged under the Constitution.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Before making that statement I inquired of the gentleman from Indiana if the precedents did not all relate to the original census bill, and the exact point I wish the gentleman to answer is——

Mr. ROBERTS. Now, I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I have only five minutes' time, and I want to answer in my own way the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin. The gentleman stated that there was no precedent for holding as a constitutional privilege anything relating to the census except the original bill providing for the taking of the census, and that the measure brought up by the gentleman from Indiana being an amendment to an original bill providing for the census would not have the constitutional privilege.

I want to read from Hinds's Precedents, volume 1, page 167, paragraph 306, as follows:

A bill relating to the taking of the census was held to be privileged because of the constitutional requirement. On January 16, 1900, Mr. Albert J. Hopkins, of Illinois, from the Select Committee on the Twelfth Census, reported as privileged the bill (S. 2179) "relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving the director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes."

There was a bill which was supplementary to the original census bill and was held to be in order and to have a constitutional privilege because it related to the census.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as I understood it, the substitute has already been adopted.

The SPEAKER. The words "joint resolution" were inserted, and the word "to-day" was taken out and the word "now" substituted since the substitute was adopted, and the Chair thinks it ought to be again submitted to the House.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the proposition as amended. Is the House joint resolution, called up by the gentleman from Indiana, in order now?

Mr. BUTLER. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 201, nays 72, answered "present" 12, not voting 104, as follows:

Mr. WEEKS with Mr. FINLEY.

Mr. SOUTHWICK with Mr. GOLDFOGLE.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have my name called and to be recorded. I was present, but I did not hear my name.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LANGLEY). Was the gentleman giving attention at the time?

Mr. SMITH of California. To tell the truth, Mr. Speaker, I was talking to another Member, but I had one ear this way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman does not appear to bring himself within the rule.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 8 OF THE CENSUS ACT.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, the contents of this resolution are fairly well known to the Members of the House by this time. The resolution simply requires an inquiry respecting the nationality or mother tongue of all persons enumerated who are born abroad and the nationality or mother tongue of the foreign parents of persons enumerated. The resolution is recommended by the Census Office. I do not care to waste time in discussing it, and now, Mr. Speaker, I move——

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman yield to me for two or three minutes?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] two minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as nearly seven hours have been taken up, I am not going to detain this House on this matter. All that I desire is to make a few brief remarks in support of the resolution which has taken up so much of the time of this House. The resolution has been properly explained, and I want to say that it is of vital importance to many millions of our people, who, though good and loyal American citizens now, yet adhere to traditional sentiments of their nationalities and mother tongues. The purpose of this resolution, as has been stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], is to enlarge the scope of inquiry respecting the nationality or mother tongue of all persons born in foreign countries in the enumeration of the Thirteenth Decennial Census. Its main purpose is to preserve in the census statistics the various nationalities of our foreign-born population coming principally from Austria-Hungary and Russia. A great many thousands of Bohemians, Poles, Lithuanians, and numerous classes of Slavs would lose their identity with respect to their nationalities in the enumeration under the present Census act. By my resolution authority is conferred upon the Census Bureau to add to the interrogatories on the population schedule a question with regard to "nationality or mother tongue." Under the act as it now stands, information regarding our foreign-born population is confined to an inquiry regarding only the place of birth of the individual. In Austria-Hungary and Russia homogeneity does not prevail among the population, because of the diversity of customs, language, and racial characteristics in numerous provinces.

Therefore under the present act, many millions of our people coming from those countries would be classified as "of the country or place of birth." And for illustration, it would bring about the merging of thousands of Bohemians, Poles, Slovaks, Slovenians, Croatians, and Krainers as Austrians. This would be manifestly unjust to these people. To permit such a classification would not only work an injustice to these people who are universally recognized as belonging to separate and distinct nationalities, but it would also lessen the value of the facts sought to be ascertained in the enumeration of the census. It would be impossible to secure any sort of adequate statistics respecting the various leading nationalities among our foreign-born population. The Director of the Census, Mr. Durand, favors and recommends the enactment of this resolution into law, so that the Census Bureau will be enabled to properly carry out in the course of enumeration and compilation a just and fair classification of all the nationalities of which our population is made up. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I earnestly hope for the adoption and passage of this joint resolution.

Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] make the motion to put this joint resolution on its passage, or shall I do so now?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I shall do it.

Mr. SABATH. I thank the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to this resolution. I think it should be amended. The communication from the Director of the Census is properly in the report and shows that he did not ask that there should be legislation that would enable him to have the census takers report on the mother tongue or nationality of the person. Now, he did not mean that it should be one or the other, as the enumerator might choose, and I submit to the House or to the committee whether or not there should be an amendment to the law that would require one or the other or both these requirements; otherwise it would be extremely confusing if the Director of the Census sent out notice to the enumerators to report as to the mother tongue or the nationality of each person. That would be ridiculous, for the census taker might be one or the other. "Mother tongue" and "nationality" are not always the same in meaning. They are not synonymous. We have, I know, in this country large numbers of people, especially out in Nebraska and other places I am familiar with, who were born under the Czar of Russia and yet never spoke anything but the German language. You take the Russian Mennonites on the plains of Nebraska and Kansas, and they will all tell you their mother tongue is German and that most all of them were born in Russia. I refer to the Russian Mennonites in particular. The Hungarian, speaking his native tongue, might say he was an Austrian. So of Swedes born elsewhere than in Sweden. So there might be a great deal of confusion. My suggestion I have now made, I think, clear. I will not offer an amendment. The gentleman in charge of this measure should do that. The word "or" should be struck out where it appears between the words "nationality" and "mother tongue," and the word "and" should be inserted in lieu thereof, so the enumerators would be required to report on both the nationality and mother tongue.

[Mr. GOLDFOGLE addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the committee amendment be agreed to, and upon that motion and the passage of the resolution I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CRUMPACKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged resolution——

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged resolution——

CORRECTION.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a correction of the RECORD of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. And the Journal?

Mr. YOUNG of New York. And the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his request.

Mr. YOUNG of New York. Mr. Speaker, I find that I am reported as not voting. I was here and voted in the affirmative on the question at that time, supporting the Chair in the vote that was then before the House.

The SPEAKER. What page?

Mr. YOUNG of New York. Page 3251, on the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Both the RECORD and the Journal will be corrected, without objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I have a matter of privilege.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have a matter of privilege——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is notified that there are many matters of privilege——

Mr. BENNET of New York. But mine is a conference report. A conference report would take precedence over anything else except a motion to adjourn.

IMMIGRATION OF ALIENS.

Mr. BENNET of New York presented a conference report (No. 783) on the bill (H. R. 15816) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved February 20, 1907.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15816) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved February 20, 1907, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4 and agree to the same.

BENJ. F. HOWELL,
WILLIAM S. BENNET,
JOHN L. BURNETT,
Managers on the part of the House.
WM. P. DILLINGHAM,
H. C. LODGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

After due consideration the managers on the part of the House concluded to recommend that the House agree to the Senate amendments.

The first amendment is purely verbal.

The second amendment relative to the jurisdiction of courts is suggested by some United States district court judges who have tried several of the "white-slave" cases.

The third amendment strikes out three words which are unnecessary.

The fourth amendment strikes out the interstate-commerce provision. A similar provision is now under consideration in the Senate as a part of the Mann bill (H. R. 12315), and the managers on the part of the House think it best to recommend that the Senate amendment be agreed to and the bill thus passed immediately, leaving the interstate matter to be considered, and, if possible, passed as a part of H. R. 12315.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 7187. An act making an appropriation for folding speeches and pamphlets for the Senate; and

S. 5873. An act for the relief of John M. Blankenship.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 10321) for the relief of homestead settlers under the acts of February 20, 1904, June 5 and 28, 1906, and March 2, 1907.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 25.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of John C. Calhoun, presented by the State of South Carolina, 16,500 copies, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of South Carolina.

The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer, who shall procure suitable copper-process plates, to be bound with these proceedings.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 1864. An act to facilitate the use for manufacturing purposes of square 328, in the city of Washington, as authorized in the act of Congress of February 1, 1907.

THE RULES.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I present a resolution made privileged by the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. If it is a resolution made privileged by the Constitution, the gentleman will present it. [Laughter.]

The Clerk will report the resolution.

House resolution 502.

Resolved, That the rules of the House be amended as follows:

"The Committee on Rules shall consist of 15 members, 9 of whom shall be members of the majority party and 6 of whom shall be members of the minority party, to be selected as follows:

"The States of the Union shall be divided by a committee of three, elected by the House for that purpose, into nine groups, each group containing, as near as may be, an equal number of Members belonging to the majority party. The States of the Union shall likewise be divided into six groups, each group containing, as near as may be, an equal number of Members belonging to the minority party.

"At 10 o'clock a. m. of the day following the adoption of the report of said committee each of said groups shall meet and select one of its number a member of the Committee on Rules. The place of meeting for each of said groups shall be designated by the said committee of three in its report. Each of said groups shall report to the House the name of the Member selected for membership on the Committee on Rules.

"The Committee on Rules shall select its own chairman.

"The Speaker shall not be eligible to membership on said committee.

"All rules or parts thereof inconsistent with the foregoing resolution are hereby repealed."

Mr. DALZELL. I make the point of order that that is not in order. It is not privileged.

Mr. NORRIS. On that point of order I want to be heard, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. NORRIS. We have just decided by a vote of the House a census bill coming under the Constitution, which reads as follows:

The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct.

It is a privileged question, and it is entitled to consideration, notwithstanding that it conflicts with the rules of the House.

Now, Article I, section 5, paragraph 2, of the Constitution reads as follows:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, if the action of the House just had makes a census bill privileged because of the Constitution, then any proposition to amend the rules must be privileged by virtue of that same instrument. It does not add to the privileged nature of the census bill that it is reported by a committee, and that was practically admitted in the discussion that took place upon the floor of the House in the colloquy between myself and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED]. If it was privileged it was privileged because the Constitution made it so, and having decided that it was privileged, because the Constitution made it privileged, its privileged character was not added to by the fact that it had been referred to a committee and a report made by the committee. Therefore, if that reasoning is good, if that judgment of the House is right, then it must follow that because the Constitution provides that the House shall make its rules under that decision it must be in order to offer from the floor of the House a resolution to change the rules of the House.

Mr. OLMSTED rose.

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. OLMSTED. I merely wish to suggest to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that while in the case of the census the Constitution is mandatory, and says the enumeration "shall be made," as to the rules of the House the Constitution is merely permissive. Undoubtedly we may make rules and undoubtedly we may change them, but the Constitution does not say we must change them, and therefore gives no constitutional privilege to such a motion to displace all other business.

Mr. NORRIS. As to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], I will say that I have not presented anything here that says we "must." If we have a right to vote it down, it is not mandatory. If the Constitution says we must, I presume under the gentleman's construction we would not be allowed any discretion as to how we shall vote.

Mr. DALZELL. The House is not compelled to make rules in order to carry on its business. In the Fifty-first Congress the House proceeded without rules and under the ordinary parliamentary law. Therefore, as my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] has pointed out——

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. DALZELL (continuing). There is no mandatory command upon the House to make rules.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no mandatory command in this resolution.

Mr. DALZELL. The rules are not pursuant to any command from the Constitution, but they are simply for the orderly procedure of business.

Mr. NORRIS. The Constitution says we may make rules. We have just decided that when the Constitution gives us a right to do a thing it is in order to bring in the proposition at any time. [Cries of "Oh, no!"] Let me finish and I will yield again. This resolution is not a mandatory affair; it is something that the Constitution gives us the right to do, however. The gentleman will have to admit that.

The Constitution gives us the right to do this; consequently, when we bring in under the constitutional provision a resolution to do just what the Constitution gives us permission to do, I say, under the recent decision, it must be in order.

Mr. DALZELL. No; the gentleman fails to make a very plain distinction. The Constitution gives the right to do it, but that does not make it privileged in the sense that the Constitution makes it, as to legislate upon a particular subject, but in that case the subject-matter is privileged.

Mr. NORRIS. But the gentleman will not contend that in the census matter we are compelled to legislate?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, certainly we are.

Mr. NORRIS. Why, if that is true, then a man's vote is absolutely controlled and he has no right to vote except one way. Suppose that the House voted down the proposition. Suppose we refused to consider it, and everybody concedes that we have that right here, and it has been done a great many times.

Mr. DALZELL. Congress can not afford to. Even the gentleman from Alabama has stated that the Constitution is only binding on us as we see fit.

Mr. NORRIS. That has nothing to do with my proposition. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, if he wants to ask me a question.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, there is so much confusion in the House, and the gentlemen who are debating this question are speaking in a conversational tone, so we do not hear, and I think we should have order.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order, and all gentlemen will be seated.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Nebraska has said that the Constitution authorizes the House to prescribe rules for its procedure. That, however, does not authorize the House to appoint somebody else to prescribe those rules.

Mr. NORRIS. And this resolution does not.

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). As the resolution of the gentleman from Nebraska provides.

Mr. NORRIS. This resolution does not do anything of the kind. It provides for a Committee on Rules, and we have a Committee on Rules now.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is not a provision of the Constitution.

Mr. NORRIS. This Committee on Rules is not obligated to make any rules.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Constitution does not say that the House shall elect a Committee on Rules.

Mr. NORRIS. Why, certainly not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Or appoint a Committee on Rules.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not say so. The Constitution does not say just what rules we shall have, and yet for many, many years we have made rules under the Constitution.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I will.

Mr. MANN. The Constitution says that we shall provide for a census, and that we may make rules. Now, we have not yet taken the census, but we have made the rules.

Mr. NORRIS. But we have passed the census law, and it is an amendment to it that we have just passed to-day and which was held in order, and this is a proposition to change the rules of the House.

Mr. MANN. I wanted to get the gentleman's opinion on that one question. We have not yet complied with the Constitution; we have not yet taken the census; and this proposition was only held in order to-day by the House as a necessary part of the proposition to take the census in the future. We have made our rules and are operating under the rules now, so far as the constitutional proposition is concerned, just as though we had made the census.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; not by any means. I will say to the gentleman that the resolution that was just held in order by reason of its being privileged on account of the Constitution was simply an amendment to a law providing for the taking of the census. This resolution is privileged under the Constitution, because it amends the rules of the House which the Constitution gives us authority to make.

Mr. GAINES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES. This resolution has not been reported from a committee, has it?

Mr. NORRIS. It has not.

Mr. GAINES. Let me ask the gentleman this question: The Constitution says that Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, excises, duties, and imposts. Would the gentleman hold that a tariff bill, a bill to amend the tariff law of the country, would be in order now from the floor without having been referred to or reported from any committee?

Mr. NORRIS. I will answer the gentleman. I want to say by way of preface to the House that when the House went on record that the census proposition was in order, it was not in accordance with my individual view. I did not believe it was privileged. But this must follow, as a logical result, it seems to me, in that case that the privileged nature of the resolution did not depend on its being reported by a committee or considered by a committee, but it was privileged, if privileged at all, because the Constitution made it so.

No committee consideration, no committee report, would add to or take away from its privileged nature. I am not responsible for the position in which the House has placed itself; but to be consistent, it seems to me this resolution would have to be held privileged the same as the others.

Mr. DALZELL. Whether privileged or not, it would have, in the first instance, to be referred to a committee.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman's own judgment is that, under the rules, his resolution is not privileged, and he simply bases his contention upon a construction of a recent ruling of the House, with which he does not agree. But is it not the truth that the gentleman's position would go to this extent—of making privileged, without reference to any committee, any proposition that any gentleman might offer at any time, to comply with any authorization which the Constitution makes?

Mr. NORRIS. That is exactly what the House has decided. The House has decided that proposition, and said that it is so. I am not responsible for it, and I can not be censured either. I do not know that the gentleman intends it in that light——

Mr. GAINES. I am not censuring anybody.

Mr. NORRIS. For proposing what I believe to be in accordance with a decision that I myself did not agree with when it was made. We will always follow a precedent when it is made by the proper authority, and take it to be the law after it is made, even though we were opposed to its establishment originally.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, some of my friends on the floor of the House have quoted me in reference to my interpretation of the Constitution to-day. I will not attempt to say what in the haste of debate I might have said, or how the reporter may have caught my language; but what I did say, or intended to say, in reference to the Constitution was that, so far as the rules are concerned, we are not governed by the Constitution in applying the rules, except so far as this House determines to act.

Mr. DALZELL. I trust the gentleman from Alabama will acquit me of any intention of misquoting him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do; because I may in the haste of debate have said just what the gentleman said. We sometimes leave out a word here and there, and give a wrong impression by our language. Now, I say again, in reference to this proposition pending before the House right now, we are not bound by the Constitution, so far as our rules are concerned, except so far as this House chooses to make the rules.

Now, as to whether the proposition of the gentleman from Nebraska is in order or not, I want to say this: This House, day after day and year after year, makes things in order that are contrary to the written rules of this House. The reason that the proposition offered by the gentleman from Indiana an hour ago was in order was not because it was referred to in the Constitution, but because the House years ago established a precedent saying that it should be in order, and therefore the precedent was followed from time to time, and it became a precedent of this House that it should be privileged and be in order.

An easy illustration of how this House makes its rules or amends its rules without a direct vote on the subject is illustrated in the way that we have built the present navy.

Up to 1886 it was held, under Rule XXI, which forbids that new legislation shall be made on an appropriation bill, that it was not in order to provide for the building of a battle ship on a naval appropriation bill, because it was new legislation, and therefore was not in order. But in 1886 the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] offered an amendment to a naval appropriation bill providing for the building of a battle ship. The chairman held that that amendment was not in order, that it was contrary to Rule XXI, which prohibited new legislation on an appropriation bill. The gentleman from Kentucky appealed from the ruling of the Chair. The House overruled the Chair and held the amendment to be in order, and from that day to this it has been held in order to provide for the building of battle ships on appropriation bills, notwithstanding Rule XXI, and so that proposition has really been made a part of the rules of this House. Now, that is simply one way the House exercises its power of determining what shall be in order and what is a matter of the highest privilege. Waiving aside all rules and everything else, I say that the House to-day should make the proposition of the gentleman from Nebraska by its vote here on the floor a matter of the highest privilege. [Applause.]

The time has come to act. You know and I know that we can not amend these rules by introducing a resolution and referring it to the Rules Committee. The Speaker himself has repeatedly said to this House that he rules by the will of the majority. The majority of this House to-day can make this a matter of privilege—the question of amending the rules of the House by a majority vote. I have no doubt that the Speaker will follow the precedents and hold that the proposition of the gentleman from Nebraska is not in order, but the House can establish a precedent and make it in order. [Applause.] The time has come, gentlemen, if you propose to amend these rules, to vote to make a proposition to amend them in order.

Now, that is the issue before the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We can not disguise it. There is no use in attempting to engage in any learned debate as to whether the matter is in order or not. The Speaker has said that he holds the power by the will of the majority. He will decide the question according to the precedents, but if you wish to abandon the precedents and make a new rule here and make this of the highest privilege, it is within your power to do so.

There is nothing revolutionary in it; there is nothing unusual in it. You have done the same thing a thousand times before, and you can do it to-day if you want to amend the rules. So when the Speaker decides this question and the gentleman from Nebraska, if the question is decided against him, appeals to the House, the issue is whether by a majority vote in this House you shall make this question of amending the rules a matter of the highest privilege, and that will be the only and sole question that will be presented to you.

As for myself, I do not believe in allowing a set of rules to bind my hands when that set of rules is no longer of benefit to my constituency and the American people. [Applause.]

So far as I am concerned, I am prepared to set the precedent to-day and say that the proposition to amend the rules of this House shall be of the highest privilege and in order at any time. [Applause.]

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, this resolution has been offered under the guise of a constitutional right. The Constitution, which should be a chart and guide for this House as well as the other branch of Congress, says that each House may determine the rule of its proceeding.

In that same instrument it is repeatedly stated what shall constitute a Member of the House, what the qualifications are, and what the House shall do and what the House may do. In this instance it only directs, and in the early days of Congress the two Houses of Congress adopted rules to govern their procedure in matters requiring concurrent action.

I understand in the history of Congress that years ago they were unable to elect a Speaker for a long period of time, and that the government of the House was under the ordinary parliamentary practice of the country.

Now, where the Constitution directs a thing to be done, and that thing is to be done, then it might be a question whether the Constitution does not direct the doing of that work. For instance, it says that each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings. If there was no journal of the House kept, then a Member of this House could rise and insist upon the constitutional privilege being enforced, namely, that of keeping a journal of its proceedings. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is not the official record. That would not answer the purpose. There had to be a journal kept; there had to be a Speaker elected; there may and may not be rules adopted by this House. Therefore it seems to me that this is not an orderly way of the most distinguished legislative body in this country to proceed. There is a way to proceed, an orderly, dignified manner in doing what this seeks to do and not to seek to do it in the way they are now, under the guise of a constitutional provision which does not apply. It seems to me that there is only one thing the Speaker can do under the rules of the House, and that is to hold that this resolution is not in order at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Would it not have been possible to pass the last resolution in the orderly way referred to by the gentleman?

Mr. PRINCE. In the case of the other resolution I have not any doubt about its being a constitutional direction that we would have to do it, and we did; and as a matter of fact the vote to-day discloses that it was a constitutional prerogative. The vote to-day discloses it was a measure of high privilege, and the only reason why the vote did not so disclose on yesterday was because some of the Members of the House did not desire to set aside calendar Wednesday, and that entered into the discussion more than the real merits of the case. To-day the merits of the case came before Congress and by an overwhelming vote the House has held that this was a constitutional provision.

Mr. JAMES. Does the gentleman contend that the resolution which was just considered by the House was any more constitutional than the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]?

Mr. PRINCE. That is what I have been trying to make clear, and if I have not, I suppose it is my fault.

Mr. JAMES. I am sorry to say that I have not seen any distinction made by the gentleman between the two questions as to their constitutionality.

Mr. PRINCE. There is a decided distinction. One says "shall" and the other "may." We may or may not have rules of this House. We have already acted and we have complied with the Constitution, if you insist it is a constitutional privilege and that we must comply with it by adopting rules.

Mr. JAMES. Likewise we had complied with the Constitution by passing the bill to take the census.

Mr. PRINCE. Not fully; only in part. This was an amendment.

Mr. JAMES. We have only passed our rules in part, and this, too, is an amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRINCE. Why, we have been acting under them at the special session and at this session, and the rules are still here.

Mr. JAMES. I suppose the gentleman heard the Speaker declare just a moment ago that the House could do anything it saw fit to do; did he not?

Mr. PRINCE. Not out of order.

Mr. JAMES. The Speaker said we could do anything we wanted to do, and we are proceeding now to do it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, there is one proposition that the present occupant of the chair and myself have always agreed upon, and that is that it is competent for a majority of this House to do whatever it wants to do. The Speaker has stated that proposition more frequently and more emphatically and more picturesquely than I have.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is too broad in his statement. The Chair has said that the House could do and has at times done whatever a majority desired to do, and instanced a case to-day where the House in the Fifty-first Congress made the Journal tell an untruth.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not think there is any difference between the Chair and myself about the proposition. I think that my memory is correct when I say that I have heard the present occupant of the chair state time and again that the House had a right to elect a new Speaker whenever it pleased.

The SPEAKER. Evidently correct, in the opinion of the Chair, while he is not called upon to rule upon the question at this time; but the House has time and again elected a new Doorkeeper, a new Clerk, and, in the judgment of the Chair, a majority of the House, not by virtue of the Constitution touching its power to adopt rules, could, if it desired, elect the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] Speaker of the House, and could do it to-day.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And I think it would be doing a very good thing if it did. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. If a majority agreed with the gentleman, then he would be Speaker.

Mr. OLMSTED. And he would not want any such proceeding as this to come up.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I was simply citing that as an illustration of the agreement between the Speaker and myself upon one proposition.

The SPEAKER. But not upon this proposition—a very different one.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is a horse of a different color. [Laughter.] It has been agitated in the papers as to whether or not this House could elect somebody to succeed the present Speaker during this session. Now, I never bothered my mind about that at all, because I never believed they were going to do it or going to try to do it; but I will state what I have said before, that the Speaker of the House simply stands for a system. I think the system is bad. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I remember hearing the Speaker say one day that this House could pass an elephant through the House if it wanted to, and that seems to me to be "going some"—to use a slang phrase [laughter]; but I wondered when I read these articles in the newspapers about the election of somebody very suddenly to succeed the present Speaker how the gentlemen who wanted to do it would get it up. If he rose to a question of privilege and moved to elect any particular man Speaker in lieu of the present Speaker, of course the Speaker himself would pass on that question as to whether it was in order or not, and I take it for granted that in self-defense the Speaker would rule such a performance out of order.

The SPEAKER. Not at all. The Speaker will be prepared upon that question whenever any gentleman thinks that the minority has become the majority. That presents an entirely different question from this question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, now, if we can change the Speaker, why can not we change the rules? [Applause of the Democratic side.] I want to say this about this case: The Speaker and myself are both lawyers. It is a long time since he has tried a case, and it is a good while since I have tried one, but I think that the lawyers who are fresh in the practice will bear me out that in innumerable instances the courts of highest resort have construed the word "may" in cases like this in the word "shall," and they have held that way oftener than they have held the other way.

Well, now, suppose that a majority of the Members of this House had made up their minds to change these rules. How are you going to do it? If it is not a matter of privilege and you can not get it up that way, how are you going to accomplish it? Suppose some gentleman here offers an amendment to the rule or a new set of rules or a new rule. He puts it in the basket. It is referred to the Committee on Rules, and it might as well be referred to the sleepers in the catacombs. [Laughter and applause.] I violate no secret when I tell you the committee is made up of three very distinguished Republicans and two ornamental Democrats. [Laughter.] They have a majority of 1, but a majority of 1 in a committee of 5 is as big a majority as a majority of 47 is in this House, and my own opinion is, from both observation and experience, that there never would be a rule reported out of that committee that the Speaker and his two Republican colleagues do not want reported. It is an impossibility in nature. And I say now—and it is all I have to say, I am not going to detain the House or weary it—that if you want to change the rules now is the accepted time, and this is the day of salvation. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. OLMSTED. It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that the question really before the House is not whether the present rules are as perfect as they may be made or whether they ought to be changed, but whether the motion which has been presented here is privileged, so that it is entitled to be considered at this moment, displacing important business which is in order under the rules. If so, it must be because it obtains that privilege under the Constitution and in spite of all rules. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has shown us that the Constitution gives this House permission to adopt rules. Of course it may do so, and of course it may change them without violating any constitutional provision except that as the Constitution intends that when we do make rules they shall be rules and that we shall be governed by them as long as they are the rules. Now, the Constitution in some respects is mandatory and in others merely permissive. So far as the census is concerned, it is absolutely mandatory——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question or two?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Suppose the Constitution had been silent on the subject of making the rules; does the gentleman contend that this House would then have no right to make rules for its procedure?

Mr. OLMSTED. It is not necessary to discuss that, because the Constitution is not silent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is not the very fact that the Constitution provides it a direction to the House to make rules?

Mr. OLMSTED. No; the House has heretofore proceeded and we might proceed for forty years without rules should we choose to do so and our acts would be constitutional.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman submit to an interruption, if the gentleman from Nebraska has finished?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Would not the same thing be true in regard to the census? If we did not pass a census bill we would not take any census, although the word "shall" is used in the Constitution?

Mr. OLMSTED. It is quite true that if we do not provide for the taking of the census, having sworn to support the Constitution and then absolutely refusing to do what the Constitution expressly commands us to do, we shall stand in the position of having violated our oath of office.

Mr. NORRIS. Will not the gentleman admit that we might very easily on that very proposition get into a predicament by which he himself would vote against the law providing for the taking of the census? The gentleman does not mean, does he, that because it says "shall" in the Constitution that we are compelled to vote for every census bill that comes before the House?

Mr. OLMSTED. Oh, no. We may exercise discretion as to the form and character of the bill itself, but we must provide for the taking of the census or disregard the Constitution.

Mr. NORRIS. In exercising that discretion, might we not very easily and honestly get into the predicament of not having any law on the statute books on the census proposition?

Mr. OLMSTED. If each one so stubbornly maintained his own position that the taking of the census failed, then no matter whose fault it might be, we should be in the position of having violated the express command of the Constitution.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman hold, then, that we would be subject to punishment on that account?

Mr. OLMSTED. Possibly not, but nevertheless the Constitution would not have been complied with.

Now, as to the taking of the census, the Constitution says it shall be taken, and it says it shall be taken within a certain time. Time, Mr. Speaker, is the essence of the matter in that particular. And that is not the only one. Take the question of a vetoed bill. The Constitution provides that if the President shall return a bill with his objections to that House in which it shall have originated, that House "shall enter the objections at large on their Journal and proceed to reconsider it." No one doubts that under that constitutional mandate, if a presidential veto should come in here and anybody should move to take it up at once, it would have a constitutional privilege over other business and above every rule of this House. The Constitution says:

> Shall proceed to reconsider it.

But when we come to other questions the Constitution is only permissive:

> Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, to raise money—

And so forth.

Congress shall have power, the Constitution says, to do a great many things, among them to borrow money on the credit of the United States; but we are not compelled to borrow money, although expressly authorized to do so. We may adopt rules and regulations. We are not compelled to do so. We are authorized to do so. Now, as to those things which are permissive, the House may make rules as to the manner and the time in which they shall consider them, but as to those things which are mandatory under the Constitution, repeated Speakers of either party have held that there is a constitutional privilege above all rules to displace other business which would be in order under the rules. It was upon that theory that we proceeded this morning to consider the census bill as privileged.

But here comes a question to amend the rules of the House or provide a committee for that purpose. It is within the power of the House to do that within its own rules, but that does not present a question of constitutional privilege so as to displace and precede.

Now, upon that point let me read very briefly what was said officially by one who by some of us, at least, is considered very high authority. It is reported in Hinds's Precedents, volume 3, page 1063.

In 1898 Mr. BAILEY, of Texas, offered a resolution as follows:

> Resolved, etc., That the heroic struggle of the Cuban people against the force of arms and the horrors of famine has shown them worthy to be free. And, second, the United States hereby recognizes the Republic of Cuba as a free and independent State.

Now, that was considered fully as important at that time, not only by the House, but by the country, as the question of a possible change in our rules. Mr. BAILEY made the argument that has been made here to-day, namely, that the Constitution authorized the House to take such action, and that therefore the resolution was privileged. He offered it as a privileged motion.

Mr. Boutelle, of Maine, made the point of order that the resolution was not in order as a privileged matter. I read very briefly from the opinion of the Speaker. He said:

> Those propositions in regard to war, or about recognition, or any of those subjects which may or may not be within our purview, do not become questions of privilege at all because we have a right to pass upon them; because that would make everything a question of privilege and end by making nothing a question of privilege.

That was Mr. Speaker Reed. The same question that we have here to-day came up in 1878, when Mr. Roger Q. Mills, of Texas, a Democrat, proposed for immediate consideration a resolution providing for a committee to revise the rules of the House, claiming privilege for the resolution on the ground that the Constitution gave to the House the power in that respect of which it could not divest itself. But upon that point that great Democratic Speaker, Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, said:

> The House, acting in pursuance of its constitutional power, has adopted certain limitations as to the changes of its rules.

Now, unless our friends on the other side are willing to overturn that eminent Democratic authority and we upon this side to overrule Thomas B. Reed, we will all vote, if given the chance, to support this point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Why, certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Has not that authority been overturned here to-day on the census proposition?

Mr. OLMSTED. Not at all. It has always been held that where there was a mandatory provision of the Constitution legislation in compliance with that demand had a high constitutional privilege, above the rules.

But as Mr. Speaker Reed said, if it is merely that we have the right to pass a thing, that does not give it privilege, because that would end by giving no privilege to anything, but would simply bring chaos in this House.

Mr. NORRIS. It might follow, as I think the gentleman admitted in a colloquy I had with him on the census resolution, that anything pertaining to the census may come up. The same argument could be used. We could have a census bill here from every Member of the House; and yet the gentleman contends that that was privileged, and he contends that this resolution is not privileged because chaos might come. He practically admitted the same thing would come on the other resolution.

Mr. OLMSTED. We have now passed the census bill. Any further bill would not be in order, because we have completed the constitutional mandate. This provision as to the rules never was a constitutional mandate. We have power to change the rules undoubtedly, but a motion to change them simply proposed from the floor can not displace and take precedence of all other business in violation of the rules. I am not discussing the merits of the proposition. It may be wise to change the rules. Some of us are very anxious to change the rules. That, however, is not the question now. What is now to be passed upon is the point of order. The question is whether this proposition is one of constitutional privilege higher than all rules and entitled to come in ahead of business which must now be considered unless the rules are utterly disregarded. If you hold that it is, then you hold that everything is privileged. If everything we may do under constitutional authority is privileged, and if you claim that everything we may offer to do is privileged, then, as Mr. Speaker Reed well said, we have in fact no privilege at all, and we are simply a chaotic and disorderly body. [Cries of "Rule!"]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, Congress is authorized to make rules for its procedure. For more than one hundred years this House has exercised that privilege and power. The present rules are the growth of a hundred years of criticism and amendment, until the rules of the House of Representatives represent the very highest wisdom in American statesmanship. The rules themselves have always provided a way in which they can be amended, and they can not be amended in any other way.

I have sat in the House with great Democrats—Randall, Carlisle, Crisp, Turner of Georgia, Hammond, and I might enumerate a list of Democrats, whom all Democrats, even those in this House, delight to honor; and all these men held the rules of the House in high respect. They said that it was necessary for the defense of the minority that the rules should be stable. They said that the House would be a House of chaos unless the rules were respected. I have never seen, prior to this House, a single occasion on which the Democratic party were ready to vote to a man to have their way in defiance of the regular rules of the House. The rules are necessary to the transaction of business; the rules are necessary to the proper deliberation of the House. The rules are necessary to protect the minority in their participation in the transaction of the business of the House.

Now, it will not do to come in with any flimsy excuse and say that because the Constitution authorizes the House to adopt rules, that therefore it is a question of privilege, against the rules, and contrary to the rules, for a Member to rise in his place and offer an amendment to the rules. You can not hide behind that excuse. You see that it has been held to-day, and it has been held for a hundred years, because the Constitution directed the Congress to make a census every decennial year, therefore that made the consideration of such legislation a question of privilege. But the House did this outside of and above the rules of the House. Because the Constitution authorizes us to make rules, as it has authorized us to make them, the very fact that we can do this within the constitutional limits, would that therefore give permission to every man who thinks it important the right to bring in a resolution to amend any rule?

There is no logic in that situation. You can not hide behind it in the presence of the intelligent American people. I have heard gentlemen on the other side of the House plead with their colleagues to observe the rules of the House, and when the rules were attempted to be violated, when the attempt was made to appeal from a Republican Speaker, stand up and advise their colleagues to stand by the rules of the House. "For by and by we will be in the majority, and we can not afford to have the responsibility unless we can also render stable the rules of the House."

I have heard that advice from Randall, from Carlisle, from Crisp, men who realized their responsibility; and I can not think that any man on that side of the House, who has the ghost of a hope that he will sit here in the majority of the next House, will come here to-day and vote to break down the system of the rules, a vote which would come back to plague you in case you had a majority of the House. Is the Democratic party, buoyed up by its hope now of victory, to make its usual blunder and come in here, in its hope to grasp after something in the future, and throw the House into chaos for the sake of an advantage it might hope to gain, when at so great a risk of loss should it gain the House, to throw the whole thing into chaos and not be able to accomplish anything, if the Members of that party have anything in mind to try to legislate in future for the good of the country?

And I say to gentlemen on this side of the House, and I say it in all earnestness and soberness, I have no epithets to bandy, I have no criticism to make of any gentleman on this side of the House for any vote that he has given, for any position that he has taken in all the debates in this Congress. I have no criticism to make of any Member on this side of the House who failed to vote for the conference report on the tariff bill last summer. I am willing to concede to them that they were doing their conscientious duty. I think they made a mistake, and I suppose they think I made a mistake. But now, at this time, you see the Greeks over there bearing gifts, and all to what end? To pass a resolution at this time to reorganize the House and reorganize the committees, now at the very moment when each one of us should strive, standing shoulder to shoulder, to hold up the arms of that brave President at the other end of the Avenue [applause on the Republican side], who is striving to do his best, with his honest purpose, with his clear vision, with his great intellect, and with his great heart beating in sympathy with the American people, striving to lead the party on in the paths blazed in the national convention, blazed in all the councils of the party in the past. Now, at this critical time, with the elections coming on next fall for the indorsement or otherwise of our deeds as a party, for the best interest of the people of the United States; led by such a man, who has consecrated his life to the carrying out of these principles for the betterment of the people. Oh, gentlemen, you who bear the name of Republicans, you who have fought in the good fight for the Republican party, have a care how at this critical time you aid and abet the enemies of that President and the enemies of the Republican party. You may vote to override the rules of the House; you may vote to override the Constitution of the United States; but can you do it and still retain the honesty and integrity of purpose which each one of you has for the principles championed by that great President, who is now leading the Republican party? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York, who has just taken his seat, said, I think very properly and correctly, that a permanent system of rules is of greater importance for the minority than it is for the majority. It is very evident that the majority can ordinarily take care of itself. But without regular rules for the prosecution of business, which operate in the parliamentary proceedings of a legislative body as the constitution does in the government of a nation the minority would be absolutely at the mercy of the majority. Now, I make this proposition, that being the case correctly stated by the gentleman from New York, that under the system of procedure of this House, particularly that portion of the system referred to in the resolution of the gentleman from Nebraska, there is no regular permanent system of rules by which the business of this House is transacted. [Applause.]

Upon every occasion when an emergency arises, when an important crisis comes up in the legislation of this House, what is the result so far as the parliamentary procedure is concerned? There is a special order brought in, ordering how this House shall proceed, placing limitation upon the membership of the House, abrogating or setting aside the regular rules, the virtue of which has been extolled by the gentleman from New York. Who brings in these special orders? That is a matter to which I want briefly to refer, the relief of which is intended and will be accomplished by the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Nebraska. Special orders are brought in not by an impartial, disinterested, parliamentary body; they are not evolved from any rule or principle of law or parliamentary usage. They are brought in by a committee of which the Speaker of the House is the controlling factor, that Speaker being at the same time the partisan leader of the majority party in this House. He is not the leader on the floor, but recognized, as I have heard him state, as the responsible leader of the majority party so far as the House of Representatives is concerned.

So the minority, under the protection which it is said they have by this system of rules, is completely at the mercy of the committee of which the controlling factor is the partisan leader of the majority party, aided by two members of that party, both partisans, selected by himself. [Applause.] We have seen here under that system a tariff law, perhaps affecting more intimately and more universally all classes of people in this country than any other legislation that this House has ever been called upon to pass, containing thousands of items, reaching into every industry and every occupation—we have seen those who, whether justly or unjustly, have been charged with having special interest in certain legislation connected with the tariff law, bring in an arbitrary rule or a special order—not entitled to be called a rule, because it was not a rule of general conduct—but an order saying that this House, or the membership of this House, should not have the privilege of offering an amendment and taking a vote upon it. [Applause.]

If the majority in this House had been protected by a set of regular rules operating generally during the session, not subject to the absolute dictation of three men, one of them the Speaker, and the other two chosen at his mercy, as all of the other committees in the House are chosen, there would not have been the dissatisfaction——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. Before any rule or special order from the Committee on Rules can become operative it must be adopted by a majority of the House of Representatives, must it not?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It must be adopted by a majority acting under the whip and spur of the organization of the House, which organization is controlled by the same man, by his power of appointing all committees, who controls the Committee on Rules. [Applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. What would be the difference in respect to the adoption of a rule reported from a committee composed as that contemplated in the resolution offered by the gentleman from Nebraska which the gentleman is supporting? Would it not be under the whip and spur of the 15 men on that committee?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I deny absolutely that there would be any whip or spur or any opportunity for it on the part of these men to exercise the power now exercised by the Speaker of this House.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentlemen now advocating the overturning of the rules of the House should accomplish what they seek, is it not reasonable to suppose that they would be as arbitrary as they claim the Committee on Rules now is?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is always to be expected that a set of men who are deprived of the benefits of the law, who are deprived of the benefits so far as this question is concerned of parliamentary law—regular debate, power to offer amendments, and to discuss them and to be heard upon them—will be determined in their efforts to secure redress; but it is perfect nonsense and futile to say that the business of this House could not be transacted and at the same time allow a fair, free, full representation from every congressional district within the confines of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman stated a moment ago that the Committee on Rules was appointed by the Speaker of the House. The gentleman, if he attended the Republican caucus, knows that the two Republican members of that committee, who serve on that committee together with the Speaker, were elected by the Republican caucus.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman from Washington permit an interruption there?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I would just like to correct the gentleman to say that while perhaps in one sense that is true, in reality the Republican caucus confirmed appointments already made and selected by the Speaker. [Applause and cheers on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to say in answer to the gentleman from Nebraska that the Speaker did not even suggest the two Members selected by the Republican caucus for the Committee on Rules.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, then, the gentleman himself must have done it.

Mr. TAWNEY. It was on my own motion that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] were elected.

Mr. NORRIS. And any man who has been here any length of time knows that when a motion comes from the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] it originates not very far from the Speaker of this House. [Applause and cheers.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I decline to yield.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to say——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I decline to yield further. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HAUGEN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he believes the Committee on Rules——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington occupies the floor not under the hour rule. He is addressing himself to a point of order. He can not yield the floor from one Member to another Member.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yielded the floor to the gentleman from Minnesota, as I understood for a question, and so far as I could see he was making a speech.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman from Washington yielded to me for a question and I proceeded to ask the question. I am not insisting on being recognized.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Iowa for a question?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes. I am willing to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] for a question, and I only refused to yield because it is evident that he was not asking a question. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa for a question.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] if he believes the Committee on Rules, consisting of 15 members, would deny the membership of this House the privilege and right to vote on at least a dozen items in a bill containing 4,000 items, such as a tariff bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Washington who has the floor will give me the privilege, I will answer the question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I decline to yield. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MADISON. Oh, give him the right to answer the question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, the House seems inclined to want him to answer and I will yield.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman decline to yield? He can not yield except for a question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. Speaker, I have not the slightest desire to prevent the gentleman from Minnesota from answering the question or expressing any views that he desires to express. Undoubtedly he will have that opportunity. I only have a few more words to say, and that is that a great issue has developed in this country during the last few months as to the mode of conducting business in this House.

It in some respects is the most important question which is before the people, and undoubtedly will be an issue in the forthcoming elections, to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has referred. I have noticed a disposition on the part of some Members of this House to be so-called "insurgents" at home and "stalwarts" or "regulars" in this House. [Applause.] Now, I want to say that on this vote upon this question affecting the very vitals of the issue which has been discussed before the country, and which has made this political situation, which is familiar to everybody, the record ought to determine and will determine how a man really stands in regard to that which we have been contending against in the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if he considers as a line of demarkation, a criterion, between a man who calls himself an insurgent and one who calls himself a Republican, whether that man will vote to make or not to make chaos of the rules of this House?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I deny that it would make chaos of the rules of the House.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I say that to hold this resolution privileged would make chaos of the rules of this House.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I beg leave to differ with the gentleman from Ohio. There never can be chaos arising from a regular rule which is regular and universal in its operation. It is absurd to say that a committee of 15, chosen from different parts of the country, consisting of Members of this House, can not make laws, special orders, and such suspension of business as may be necessary to conduct the business of the House.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman further yield? Do you believe, sir, upon your reputation as a Member of this House, that this resolution is privileged? Do you, sir?

Mr. POINDEXTER. What is the question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Do you believe that this is, within the rules of this House, a privileged resolution?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am undoubtedly of the opinion it is privileged according to the ruling of the House on yesterday and to-day.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not talking about any ruling of the House on yesterday or to-day; I am asking the gentleman himself. [Jeers on the Democratic side.] My dear friends, that jeering only helps——

Several Democratic MEMBERS. Then, what are you kicking about?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would like to ask the gentleman, upon his credit as a Representative, whether he considers this to be a privileged resolution or not? That is the question, and the only question, now before this House.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I consider it absolutely privileged, that this House has the power at any time it sees fit to adopt rules for its own government.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not talking about the power of the House to adopt rules, but is this, under the rules, a privileged resolution?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; it is, undoubtedly, under the rules; and certainly will be, under the rules, after this vote is taken. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio, since he has gotten into this debate, a question. Are you in favor of limiting the power of the Speaker of this House as at present constituted, or not?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I certainly am; but in a regular way. I will not trample upon my intellect and sense of right in seeking so to do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now is the day and hour of your salvation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not desire the gentleman from Washington to tell me the hour of my salvation. I think I will discover it for myself.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think he would be safe if he depended upon learning it for himself?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, I hope you will. I hope the gentleman will see the light. I have the right to express an opinion——

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. PRINCE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What is the question before the House?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The question before the House is whether the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Nebraska is a privileged resolution.

Mr. PRINCE. Then it is a question as to a privileged resolution?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. PRINCE. And that is to be determined by the Speaker or by the House.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; undoubtedly; or both the Speaker and the House. The House has the last guess, as I understand. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say there has been a great deal of talk about the age of the rules of the House. They are not so old. Some of them are and some of them are not. Some of them have been adopted at this Congress under the necessity of a political situation; and even if they were old, even if these rules, as has been said here, are the product of the evolution of centuries, I deny that that is any reason which would make it unwise to change them. The very fact of changing conditions, changing character of Speakers, changing character of political parties, and the changing character of the interests that are back of the organization of the two Houses of Congress make it necessary to change the rules for the very reason that they are old, and because in many instances they are outdated. One of the oldest rules of the House was that the Speaker of this House, at least it was the practice and usage of the House, was an impartial parliamentary presiding officer.

Do you want to change that? That was the condition when this House was first organized, and I desire to say, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, that that is the character of the presiding officer at the present time of every great parliamentary body in the world except this House of Representatives. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Many of those bodies are more numerous than ours. They contain a larger membership, and yet they manage to do business with a parliamentarian presiding over their sessions who is not associated with the active political partisan management of one of the political parties.

Now, I think there is no sophistry, there is not any kind of a technical argument about whether this matter is privileged or is not privileged that can deceive the people of this country as to the issue. The merits of the question, the merits of this rule, have been put in issue here by the leader of the Republican party in his speech a few moments ago upon the floor.

And that is what is going to be accepted by the country. That is the interpretation, and the proper interpretation, to be put upon the vote which is taken here to-day, of whether or not the man who is voting is in favor of limiting the inordinate, tyrannical power of the Speaker of the House of Representatives or whether he is in favor of continuing it. As far as I am concerned, as a Member of this House, I am in favor of limiting it. This House would have, whether this rule is changed or not, the power to shut off debate and the power to close debate. That power always rests with the House, and it is unreasonable and absurd to say that if the power of the Speaker is limited and if he is taken off of the Rules Committee, and that Rules Committee is selected in a fairer way, so as to make it more representative, that the House of Representatives under the new system can not continue to do business in a parliamentary way, and in the same way, so far as the rules of procedure are concerned, that it has been accustomed to transact business in.

As far as I am concerned, I desire to take this opportunity to register my position in accordance with what I have said at home and what I say here, and I hope that those Members of the House who have declared at home that they are in favor of limiting the power of the Speaker will have the courage to say so to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL and Mr. TOWNSEND rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few observations, having reference more particularly to the criticism made upon the Committee on Rules by the gentleman who has just taken his seat. As has already been stated, the rules of the House are not the creation of any one man or of any set of men. They are not the creation of any one Congress or any number of Congresses. They are an evolution. They are the outgrowth of the parliamentary necessities of one hundred and twenty years of congressional history. There is not a rule in the book of rules that does not have a reason for its being put there. There is not a rule in the book of rules that does not have a reason for being retained there.

Now, the gentleman criticises the Committee on Rules, not so much the personnel of the committee as the character of the committee. Now, let us see. There have been introduced into this House since this Congress began about 30,000 bills. Those bills can not all receive consideration. They will be thrashed out in committee, and there will be reported to this House a number of them, those selected as worthy of legislation. Provision is made in the rules for the consideration of those bills. Those of certain character go on the Union Calendar, those of another character go on the House Calendar, those of another character go on the Private Calendar; but, even with this classification of bills, it is absolutely impossible that all the bills on the calendars shall be considered at any single Congress. Bills of very great importance, bills of national importance, go upon the calendar oftentimes at such a stage of the session that in the ordinary course they can not be considered. How shall those bills be dealt with? Only by a process of selection. How shall worthy bills be selected? Only by a committee, and by a committee so constituted that it can give to the selection of those bills deliberation, and, if need be, prompt action.

The Committee on Rules is the committee to which is delegated the selection of the bills that ought to be passed in this House.

The power of the Committee on Rules and the extension of its functions have grown as the size of the House and the size of the country have grown. The Committee on Rules reached its highest power in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses, Democratic Houses, when Mr. Crisp was Speaker.

Now, let me say in this connection, not only are these rules an evolution, but they are the rules that have been adopted by both parties. The Democratic party, in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses, adopted the Reed rules, which are substantially the rules to-day.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Do you think that that is a strong recommendation of them?

Mr. DALZELL. Why, it simply shows that the Democratic party, notwithstanding its prejudice against the rules, when it came into power found these were the only rules under which they could successfully do business. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, the report of the Committee on Rules has no force or effect unless it has behind it a majority of this House. Speaker Crisp held that the Committee on Rules had the right to originate a rule. All other Speakers, Republican Speakers, have held, as the present Speaker has, that the Committee on Rules can only act upon a matter submitted to it. When the Committee on Rules passes on a resolution introduced by a Member of the House, it makes its report to the House; but that report has no force or effect unless it has behind it the majority of the House. But, ah, the gentleman from Washington says, when the Committee on Rules reports, the majority, acting under the whip and spur of a single man, indorses the report of that committee. Mr. Speaker, I have no such poor opinion of the character of the membership of this House as to believe that a majority of this House would so sacrifice its judgment and sense of responsibility to its constituents as to pass any measure under the whip and spur of any one man or half dozen men in this House. [Renewed applause.]

I believe that the men who constitute the American House of Representatives stand on a higher plane than that suggested by the gentleman from Washington. He complains that great bills like the tariff bill are passed under a rule. The rule in the case of the Payne bill selected and submitted to the judgment of this House the prominent questions upon which differences of opinion existed. Why, a tariff bill containing maybe a thousand items, unless there was some such rule, in a House constituted of nearly 400 Members, exercising the right to debate under the rules of the House, would not be passed in two years' time. What has been the experience in this House? The McKinley bill was passed under a rule. The Wilson bill was passed under a rule.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, Mr. Speaker. I have heard the gentleman state that same proposition here time and again; and as a naked proposition it is true; but I want to ask him this: If it is not true that the Wilson bill was debated in this House by sections and by items for three weeks before it ever went over to the Senate, and every man had a perfect opportunity to offer an amendment and to make any speech he wanted to?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, yes; it was debated three weeks. But it went to the Senate, and when it came back it came with 649 Senate amendments, and not one of them was ever debated. [Applause on the Republican side.] They were passed under a rule.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How many amendments did the Dingley bill have?

Mr. DALZELL. I do not know, and do not care.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It had 50 more than the Wilson bill.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not care.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How many amendments did the Payne-Aldrich-Smoot tariff bill have when it came back?

Mr. DALZELL. I do not know, and I do not care.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Eight hundred and one.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not care anything about that. I am simply showing how misleading is the suggestion made by the gentleman from Missouri when he talks about the Wilson bill having been debated here for three weeks, when I show him that when it came back from the Senate with 649 amendments they were adopted in this body under a drastic rule reported from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me, I will state that there was not even a full conference on the Wilson bill.

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly not.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Assuming, as the gentleman does, that some wrong was done in the administration of the rules in a Democratic Congress long past, do two wrongs make one right? Does that justify a wrong to-day, even if it be true?

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman certainly misapprehends me. I do not concede that any wrong was done even in the case of the Wilson bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am simply demonstrating that the same necessity that existed for the introduction and passage of a rule in the case of the last tariff bill existed in the case of all tariff bills; and I would remind the gentleman also, although my friend from Missouri, I think, would rather I would not, that on that same occasion, after the passage of 649 amendments under a rule, a bill putting coal on the free list, that had never been sent to a committee, a mere manuscript bill, was sent to the desk, and under a rule passed after fifteen minutes' debate. Another popgun bill, putting ore on the free list, was sent up to the desk and met the same fate. According to all the precedents of our history the right and wisdom and propriety of the House of Representatives, by a Committee on Rules, to select the business to be transacted, when indorsed by a majority, has vindicated itself.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. Is not the very argument the gentleman makes the strongest argument for changing the rules at this time?

Mr. DALZELL. It is not. It is necessary that the Committee on Rules should be a small committee, ready to meet at any time and all times, and so constituted that there shall be no controversy between the members of the committee as to whether this particular legislation or that particular legislation in which one wing of the committee is interested or another wing of the committee is interested shall be considered by the House. It should be a committee no larger than the committee that now exists, acting, as it does, in response to a resolution from the floor of the House and backed by the judgment of a majority of the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, just a word or two more and I will conclude. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] introduced this resolution under the guise of constitutional privilege. That pretense was immediately abandoned, because I do not believe that in this body there are half a dozen men who will get up and honestly say that they believe that the question now before the House is a question of constitutional privilege. So that pretense was abandoned. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the leader of the minority, were brutally frank. They did not claim that it was a question of privilege. They said, in substance, it was a question that the majority, overriding the rules of the House, could make a question of privilege. I do not want it to go to the country, and it will not go to the country, that we are acting here to-day upon a question of constitutional privilege. We are acting here to-day without regard to the Constitution, without regard to the rules of the House, simply because a majority, irrespective of constitutional rules and by revolution, are determined to make their way. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], leader of the minority, looking over to this side of the House, tells us Republicans, a Republican House, that this measure will be carried, because he has the votes. If he has the votes—he has the votes of the Democratic party in this House—he must have, in addition, the votes of others who were elected as Republicans, and who, I have no doubt, will be compelled to answer to their constituents for their action to-day, whatever the result of that action may be. [Applause.]

Mr. SAUNDERS. I wish to speak to the law of one feature of the proposition before the House. This proposition, according to the claim of its proponent derives its right to consideration from the Constitution itself. But the gentlemen in opposition seek to draw a distinction between that section of the Constitution from which the motion of the gentleman from Indiana is supposed to derive its right, as a privileged motion, and the section upon which the gentleman from Nebraska relies for the parliamentary status of his motion. This distinction is based upon the fact that section 2 of the Constitution uses the word "shall," while section 5 relating to rules is in the following terms:

> Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.

This contention in itself carries the necessary implication that if the word "may," is properly to be construed as "shall," then the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska, and that of the gentleman from Indiana rest alike upon the same solid foundation of the Constitution.

It is not an infrequent thing for the courts to rule that the word "may," must be construed as "shall," to carry out the legislative intent. In fact such a construction occurs within every jurisdiction with which I am familiar. The rule of construction is based upon a consideration of the context in which the word "may" occurs. If it is obvious upon contemplation of this context, that the legislature while using "may," intended it to have the effect of "shall," then it will be construed to mean "shall." In my own State in respect to the issue of certain licenses, the statute uses the word "may," but our court of last resort has long since read the word "shall," into the statute, and justified its ruling by abundant precedent. Now suppose we look at the different sections of the Constitution in which the words "shall" and "may," respectively, occur. When the Constitution confers upon Congress the authority to legislate on a number of different subjects, it very properly uses the words that the Congress "shall have power." This language confers jurisdiction. Congress has no authority to legislate, save to the extent that power is conferred by the organic law.

But unless the word "may" is to be construed as "shall," in the section relating to rules, the Constitution has done an idle thing in this connection. If it merely intended to say that the House shall have authority to determine and establish rules for its government and procedure, there was no occasion to make any pronouncement on the subject. Entirely apart from any provision of the Constitution, the House which it established would have full authority to adopt its rules of procedure. If the word "may," in this connection, merely affords a discretion, then it confers nothing. The House has no greater power under this section than it would possess if the Constitution was entirely silent on the subject. Hence, I say, in order to give meaning and effect to the Constitution, this section must be construed to lay an imperative command upon the House to establish rules and adopt a system of procedure. This being true, the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska is upon the same footing of privilege as the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, upon which the House acted a few moments since.

I wish to say that the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, reenforced by the gentleman from Ohio, that chaos will follow from adopting this resolution is utterly without force.

I have no apprehension that any action taken by the majority of this House will produce chaos. I have too much confidence in the wisdom, the patriotism, and the good sense of this body to believe that any deliberate action on its part will result in confusion or disaster of any sort. Too long has the majority made a fetich of the present rules. We have been assured so often of their merits and virtue that the assurance has somehow lost its force. We have been warned so often that chaos would ensue if we touched this sacred, this holy thing, that the tocsin of disaster to come has somehow ceased to inspire alarm. For my own part, I avow that I am willing and ready to try some new thing. Progress involves change. Even the procedure of this House is susceptible of improvement. In the country at large there is a strong desire to see a genuine reform of our rules compassed and brought about. This resolution is a step in that direction. If on trial it proves to be unworkable, we can easily return to old conditions; but I confess to a lively desire to make the experiment. [Applause.]

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I regret that so much time has been wasted. We have a great deal of important business to do in this House. About three or four weeks ago the Republican Members of the Ohio delegation met and talked and concluded that matters of this kind ought to be kept out of the deliberations of the House until our real duties were performed, and I hope that the Chair's ruling will be to exclude this and that that ruling will be sustained by this House.

If this resolution should pass in this Chamber, then we may go home without performing our work here. This Chamber will be transformed from a deliberative Chamber into a wrangling club, and the country will not excuse us for any such mistake and blunder. It is a serious matter. You can not go forward without rules. There is no one present here to-day who does not know that it is a mere pretense that this resolution is in order.

Let this resolution prevail and pass this Chamber, and how are we going to perform the business that we are sent here to perform? If it were in order I would make a motion to put off indefinitely the consideration of this whole matter that the serious affairs that we came here to consider may go forward in an orderly way. This is an important matter, and those that are responsible for changing the proceedings of this House into a debating club or a wrangling club will be held responsible to the country. [Applause.]

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, no one has any higher regard for law and order than have I. I practiced law for a number of years, and I learned to respect both the common and the statute law, and I stand for law and order here and everywhere. When I came here as a Member of this House, as a Representative of a district as good as any in the country, I discovered that some of the rights of this House, which means the rights of the people I represent, were being invaded and defeated by indirection; and to-day when I heard the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], I knew that those remarks, standing by themselves and independent of the proceedings of this House in the last few years, would receive my highest regard and respect, as well as the respect of my colleagues; but when I look back over the proceedings of this House, and when I know, and the entire country knows, that by indirection the will of this House has been thwarted time and time again, then I say, when we have a resolution before us, which proposes to do by direction the will of the House, it is time now and here on this occasion to manifest our power, to enforce the rule of the majority, in the language that has frequently been expressed by the able Speaker of this House. I say now and here, in the light of what has occurred over and over again, in defeating, in holding back, in preventing bills that have been introduced in this House, which were in accord with the wish of the entire country, or at least a great majority of the people of the country at large—I say, when those bills have time and time again been pigeonholed by select committees, that now, since the question arises on this floor, the House can by a direct vote do directly the will of the House, and now it is time for us to act in accord with that will. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, my experience with the rules of this House has not been a happy one. I have endeavored to get some consideration from the Committee on Rules. I have written to the members of the committee; I have spoken to some of them in behalf of my resolution, which is in the interest of all the people, and yet I have not succeeded in getting a hearing from that committee. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES. May I ask the gentleman what his resolution was?

Mr. FISH. I am very glad to tell the gentleman and the House that it was a resolution which simply called on the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to inquire into the feasibility and the desirability of establishing a parcels-post system.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he has not correctly stated the purpose of his resolution; that his resolution demanded that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads report absolutely within thirty days, and fixed the time for the report.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I have been over that question with the gentleman on another occasion, and he well knows that it was within the power of his committee to change the resolution so that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads should make its report within sixty or ninety days if need be. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. But that was no reason why the gentleman should misstate his resolution, however.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I was merely stating that I could not get even a hearing.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I deny that a hearing has ever been refused.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I have the evidence in writing that I asked a hearing, and none has been granted me. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Well——

Mr. FISH. I asked the gentleman—oh, I have the floor, and he can have it afterwards, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FISH. I will ask the gentleman, in the six weeks that the resolution has been before the Committee on Rules, why it has not answered my request and given me the privilege of a hearing?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Does the gentleman ask that question?

Mr. FISH. Yes; why have you not given me a hearing?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I wrote the gentleman in person that while I did not approve of a parcels post myself I was opposed to suppressing any measure, and that I was willing to give him a hearing and report the bill adversely.

Mr. FISH. I would ask the gentleman, then, why he did not give me a hearing?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman never appeared and asked for a hearing.

Mr. FISH. But I have written time and time again asking for it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, written——

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman wants his correspondence with me on this subject published in the RECORD, I will publish my letters. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do want it published in the RECORD.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman shall have it.

Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman not know that he could have got that information by sending the resolution to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and that the utmost that the Committee on Rules, under the circumstances, could have done would be to send it to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] did not even have the grace to answer my letter. [Laughter and applause.] Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentlemen composing the Committee on Rules what possible way a Member of this House has to get a bill or resolution out of a committee of this House which does not care to report it?

Mr. DALZELL. You mean any committee?

Mr. FISH. The Committee on Rules; I will take the gentleman's own committee.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of California. I understand the gentleman was talking about a bill before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads with reference to the parcels post. Is that the trouble that is in your mind?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California need not be so flippant. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of California. I want to say the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads—I am speaking in the absence of the chairman—has given hearings on that subject, and we never found you there.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SMITH of California. The committee is open to hearings on that subject, as others; but we can not hear the gentleman when the gentleman is absent.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield for a speech from the gentleman from California. The gentleman from California well knows, coming back to the parcels-post question, that he has had a bill on that subject in his committee for a year, and the gentleman's committee has made no progress, and that the committee has never given any public notice of a hearing and this is the first intimation that I have had that one has been held.

Mr. SMITH of California. Have you ever been before the committee and called it up for consideration and asked for its consideration?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. FISH. Another subject which might be brought to the attention of the House and another reason I have for taking every opportunity for changing the rules of this House now and hereafter is that my friend from New York [Mr. FOELKER] has had before the Committee on Ways and Means a resolution in which every man in this country is interested at the present time, and that is the looking to the reduction of the tariff on beef. [Applause.] And yet I believe it has made no progress so far. If it has, the gentleman from New York will correct me.

Now, Mr. Speaker, for one I yield to no man in my Republicanism. I will follow the gentleman from New York, the leader of this House; I will follow the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Ohio, and even the gentleman from Iowa [laughter], in support of every measure which is in the Republican platform, and there are measures advocated in that platform that I believe I will go farther in support of than some of those gentlemen. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I regret that anybody, no matter how high he may be in the councils of the Republican party in this House, should inject the name of the President into a question of changing the rules of the House. Sir, I believe the House should be independent of the Executive. [Applause.] I believe it is not the province of the President to dictate to us how the rules should be constituted; and I have too high a respect for the President to believe he would do so; aye, more than that, I do not believe anybody has the authority to use the name of the President as desiring to interfere in the matter of the rules of procedure of the House. [Applause.] If there is any man in this Chamber who can state that the President is in favor of the rules of the House as they stand to-day without any liberalization, let him arise and speak. [Applause.] The failure to respond convinces me that my estimate of the President's attitude is correct.

Mr. Speaker, those on this side of the House should remember when we are considering this question that these rules are not Republican rules. They were rules introduced by a Democrat, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. [Laughter.]

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, no.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Very few.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, some gentleman here said, sotto voice, "very few." If anybody can deny the broad statement I made, then let him arise in his place and so state. [Laughter and applause.] The Journal of the opening day of the special session, March 15, 1909, will bear out my statement. Now, Mr. Speaker, I said in my speech the other day that I should take every opportunity that might arise to amend the rules. I believe the people of this country, without regard to politics, believe in changing the rules. There has been no representative form of government in this Chamber under the rules. I would like to debate the question of changing the rules in every congressional district in this country, and I will undertake to say that the Republicans of nine out of ten of those districts would vote to change the rules. I am one of those who have been hoping against hope. I have been trying to persuade the leaders on this side of the House to give an opportunity to change the rules, but for one I have seen no signs on their part to do so; therefore I am not to be deterred by the talk about chaos that has been alluded to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS]. I am not so timid a soul as all that. If the gentleman can explain where chaos would come in because a larger number of gentlemen, to be elected by the House, should make the rules, instead of those gentlemen who now constitute the Rules Committee——

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FISH. Certainly; I am always ready.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] if he believes an elected majority should control the House in ordinary legislation?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I do so believe, when they act in the interest of the people, and the whole people. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. And who is to be the judge as to whether they act in the interest of the people?

Mr. FISH. Each individual Member on this floor is to be the judge according to his own conscience.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. One other question, if I may be allowed.

Mr. FISH. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The Norris resolution provides, if I understand it correctly, and if I do not, I would like to be corrected, that the House shall elect a committee of three, which committee shall select a committee of fifteen.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The House elects a committee of three, and those three divide it into groups, do they not?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Then, under the present order of things, judging by the evidence yesterday and to-day, the Democrats, with a minority of the Republicans, can select this committee of three?

Mr. NORRIS. No. Oh, the committee of three they might select.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Then that is the whole thing.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit me there in answer to the question——

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Certainly, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] will permit?

Mr. NORRIS. I am willing, as far as I am concerned, to agree it shall be a committee of one, and that it shall be the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] himself.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Am I not right that the resolution provides that the House shall elect three members?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Now, with the shape that things have taken here, the Democrats, with a small minority of the Republicans, would virtually control the legislation of the House. Is that not true?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It certainly is.

Mr. NORRIS. It is a very unimportant thing.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Why unimportant?

Mr. NORRIS. It is divided into groups. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to agree it shall be a committee of one, and that the gentleman himself [Mr. GARDNER of Michigan] shall constitute that committee, and I believe that would have unanimous consent.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. On the theory that if it came in, the Democrats, with a minority of Republicans, could amend it to suit themselves.

Mr. NORRIS. They could; but it is not at all likely there would be anything wrong with the report when it came in.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Will the gentleman allow me to say in answer to the gentleman from Nebraska——

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the public attention of this country at the present time is more centered on the rules of this House than on any one question. I believe that that is the burning issue of the hour, and now is the time for us to act one way or the other. [Applause.] We can not shirk our responsibilities by the mere statement that it is going to create chaos. That view could not be maintained in any congressional district in this country. I take exception to any statement that these rules are Republican rules. In what State of this Union has or could a resolution be passed in any state Republican convention indorsing the rules of the House as they now exist? I think a man would have much courage and but little discretion who would rise in any Republican convention and make that proposition.

I know that in our delegation from the State of New York some gentlemen tried to induce the delegation to pass a resolution to the effect that the rules of the House were adequate, and I also know that no such resolution was passed by our delegation. Moreover, the rules of this House have not even been sanctioned by a vote of a caucus of the Republican Members. Why, then, should not Members be permitted to assail them without having their party fealty questioned?

Mr. BATES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FISH. Certainly.

Mr. BATES. Will not the gentleman kindly state to the Members of this House why it is that the public mind is more focused upon the subject of the rules of this House to-day than it was five or ten years ago, when the rules were substantially the same, only that they have been liberalized since that time?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I will answer the gentleman, that the country did not know how many bills which were in the interest of the people had been smothered in the committees.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman can not now find in the closets of the committees any valuable legislative suggestions which did not come to light five years ago or ten years ago, can he?

Mr. FISH. I do not know that. But I do know that the rules are so constituted at present that a Member can not get legislation on bills to which he is entitled on the floor of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken up more time than I expected to, because gentlemen have interrupted me; but as for myself I shall take this opportunity, and I shall take every opportunity that arises during my term in Congress, to vote for a liberalization of the rules of this House and a restoration of representative government. [Loud applause.]

Mr. FASSETT. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of this House, on both sides and in the middle of the aisle, I am going to beg your indulgence, because this debate has taken a little wider latitude than a close discussion of the resolution introduced, upon its merits or upon its parliamentary force and value, and has entered somewhat into the fundamental principles of party government and political administration, if I also depart from the subject immediately in hand.

As my good friend—and I hope he is my good friend—[Mr. CLARK of Missouri], the leader of the minority, said the other day: "We may fool all of the people some of the time and some of the people all of the time, but we can not fool all of the people all of the time," and that was originally said by that great Republican, our first President, Abraham Lincoln. We are playing politics and we are playing for great stakes. We are robust partisans, every one of us. The Democratic minority—and I applaud it for the fact—is playing for points. It is straining every nerve to outmaneuver the Republican majority in this House. This is a great arena, wherein political giants and a few political dwarfs are engaged in struggling for the possession of the Government of the greatest people in the world. [Loud applause.]

We have developed inside of the Constitution, and outside of the Constitution, in accordance with the genius of our blood and our people, a government of a great people by great parties, parties that depend for their charters upon the votes of a free people from the various sections of the country, the highest source from which governmental charters have ever proceeded, ever can proceed, or ever will proceed. Men who hold elective office in this country hold such office in every case because the majority of the qualified electors in their districts have given them a mandate to proceed to carry out the promises which the party the candidates represent had made; and good faith and the rules of the game require that men who have received such a trust shall discharge it for the benefit of the estate in strict accord with the terms of the trust. Any man is reprobated properly who betrays any trust that is given to him, whether it be as an alderman, a supervisor, a member of the assembly, a state senator, or as a Member of Congress.

In this House we are divided by one great line of separation, invisible, but recognizable as clearly as that center aisle is recognizable. On one side are men who have come from constituencies who believe, however misguidedly, in the promises and platforms, in the principles, and in the purposes of the Democratic party. On the other side are men who come here because a majority of the people in their districts, seeing them nominated upon Republican platforms, accepting the Republican trust, believed they were going to come here as Republicans and govern themselves according to the purposes of the entire Republican party officially expressed. So every man who is a man, and not a jellyfish, is a partisan. It is not wrong to be a partisan, especially when partisanship addresses itself to the highest purposes of patriotism. We were all elected by partisans because we were partisans, and as such represented party purposes as expressed by party platforms. None of us received any commission to betray his party at any time, but each of us was elected by majorities which expected us to act with the majority of our party associates on all party matters. I take it that no Democrat was elected to cooperate with our party, nor was any Republican elected to hand over the Republican control of this House to our political opponents.

A man ought to have opinions and convictions. He ought not to be a political chocolate eclair. He has a right to his individual liberty of opinion and action; always, however, within the limits of the trust which has been bestowed upon him and which he has accepted from his party to act with the majority.

Now, parties, like governments, provide machinery whereby men may adjust differences of opinion. If we have 200 men on this side, I believe they are likely to have, if not 200 different opinions, at least 200 different kinds of opinion on almost any one of the great questions that concern the people of the United States, and we have planned to meet together and compare views. In my judgment, the place to adjust differences of opinion on unimportant questions, and on important questions of public policy and party policy is not in public, where one minority uniting with another minority may make a temporary majority; but in the family caucus, where we may adjust our opinions and govern ourselves, as representative government must always be controlled, by an expression properly taken in a proper place, of the will of the majority of those qualified to speak. In this way only can party efficiency and unity be maintained and party responsibility as distinguished from personal whim be preserved.

Now, we have heard a great deal here about what the majority of this House can do. We have heard some of the humorous remarks of the Speaker quoted with approval, and to-day, with a grim approval by the leader of the minority, that a majority of this House could pass anything. It is true, and the majority of this House ought to be able to control the action of this House. Apart from courteous treatment, apart from reasonable consideration to the minority, the majority ought absolutely to control everything that the House does, everything that emanates from this House. We Republicans were put here by the American people for that purpose. They had tried you gentlemen on the other side of the aisle, and, as John Sharp Williams once said here on the floor, they are afraid of you. They have tried us, and he said they had grown tired of us, but still we are here. Now, we have the power. The people gave it to us as Republicans. We may surrender it. We may give you any part or all of our power, but if we strip ourselves of every particle of our power we can not strip ourselves of one iota of our responsibilty, a responsibility we accepted as Republicans from Republicans. [Applause.] And when your turn comes, my Democratic friends, which I trust heaven may long defer, and you sit in the seats of the mighty, and you are in control, and you are confronted with the problem of reconciling your many irreconcilable bundles of alleged principles, announced in all your platforms, you will have to be responsible to the country; and the majority that ought to control in the House of Representatives or the Senate is not a temporary affiliation of two minorities, but the majority commissioned by the American people, with responsibility for all legislation and the enactment of all laws. [Applause.]

Now, with reference to the so-called insurgents, I think our friends on the other side are congratulating themselves a little too soon. They are apt to refer to the insurgents as near-Democrats or mercerized Republicans. [Laughter.] They were almost on the point in their Democratic family caucus the other day of passing resolutions denouncing the Republican insurgents because they had gone back on the Democrats. [Laughter and cries of "No!" "No!" on the Democratic side.]

Well, I should say that my information came from the newspapers of this city, and I have never heard it denied. If it is not true, then my remark has no application.

A MEMBER on the Democratic side. It has no application.

Mr. FASSETT. But I advise you under all the circumstances, and not depending on what I have seen in the papers, but from what I have heard here on this floor, that you should study the meaning and application of the word "parallax." Parallax, as I understand it, is the distance that divides the point where an object seems to be from one standpoint, and seems to be from another standpoint, from the point where the object really is. [Laughter.]

It is very necessary to understand their parallax in order to understand the movements of the heavenly bodies. It is necessary to understand the parallax of the insurgents to know exactly where they stand. I undertake to say that when you welcome them as assistant Democrats you do gross violence to their most sacred convictions. I undertake to say that were I as a regular to denounce them as irregular, they would fling back the taunt into my face and say, "Not so. Do you suppose from fair Washington or bleeding Kansas or fertile Nebraska I come as a Democrat to help Democracy, to be an assistant Democrat? Not so. I am progressive. I am a better Republican than you are. I am not joining the Democracy in an attempt to peddle political patent medicine. I am for the enactment of a political pure-food law. I want the label to correspond with the package and the package contents to correspond with the label." So they lay the flattering unction to their souls that they are progressive Republicans.

They are not for what your platform declares for. They do not believe in your follies of cheap money, of fiat money, or free trade. They believe in Republican principles; they are here after having been nominated on a Republican platform, and they see the light in accordance with the intelligence God has given them to see the light. They are earnest men, striving to outdo us in making the American people believe the Republican party is the only party that has a consistent programme and a constructive statesmanship that will result in the benefit to the American people, as demonstrated in all points by the history of fifty years. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I do not agree with these gentlemen that they ought to take the power that the whole people have given to the entire Republican majority and hand it over to the Democratic minority in anything that goes to affect the vital energy, the unity, the efficiency of the Republican majority elected by the people to the House of Representatives. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, for seven years the present occupant of the Chair has been known to us and to the country as our Speaker, "Uncle Joe." He is the same man now as then, with the same attitude toward men and toward the rules, the fairest presiding officer I have ever had the good luck to sit beneath. Twice by unanimous vote of Democrats and Republicans publicly thanked for his fairness. [Applause.] Lauded in private, exalted and reverenced in secret, but under the pressure of untoward and abhorrent forces, which I will not stop to recount, he is held up by political opponents for selfish reasons as a political bugabco by the very men who will extol him in private. I say that his record in the Speaker's chair challenges comparison with the record made by any presiding officer since the beginning of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.] And the only critics of the Speaker, without exception, will be men who are sore, men who are angry, because, like my friend from New York [Mr. FISH], their particular legislative baby has not been taken out of the committee cradle first. [Laughter and applause.]

There are 30,000 legislative babies in our committee crib. Some must come out first; but without discussing that, Mr. Speaker, the organization of this House is the same, and the rules are the same, that we have lived under for the seven years under which we blessed the country in the Fifty-eighth, Fifty-ninth, and the Sixtieth Congresses. Then we had these same rules. Then we had this same crystallized wisdom of one hundred and thirty years of parliamentary experience to guide us. At any time the minority could, if it pleased, pass two weeks in roll calls to call the attention of the country to things both sides agreed to. The minority is protected by law the same as the weak man is protected by laws outside. And look at the record! Look at the splendid Republican laws Congress has rolled up under these rules and under this Speaker—a magnificent record, unsurpassed, nay, unparalleled for constructive statesmanship and for beneficent results to our people, in the history of the legislation in any country. I need not ask you to take my word alone. I have a witness whom I will summon presently.

This is not a question, gentlemen—be not deceived—this is not a question merely of a change of rules. It is a question of a change of party control. It is a question of losing grip. It is a question of whether or not the powers of this Republican majority are to be emasculated by an unnatural and abhorrent alliance with our natural born enemies. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] If these rules are to be changed, they should be changed as the tariff was changed, not by their enemies, but by their friends. No; the first man to run to the cover of an efficient code of rules, mark my words, if the country should establish the Democracy in power, would be our friends on the other side, and the man over the hurdles first would be the distinguished orator from Missouri, who expects to be the Democratic Speaker. [Laughter and applause.]

Do you suppose he would consent to trust 15 of the wild, untamed steeds of the Democracy to fix his rules or to name his committees which are to make him responsible to the great 46 States of this Union? No; the gentleman is far too canny, too wise, too prudent, and too experienced. We have much at stake, far higher and greater than satisfaction of any man's resentment; it is the success of the Republican party's programme—the programme we were sent here by Republicans to carry out. It is the success of Taft's administration. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is the success or defeat of our great party. The country is not ready yet to transfer from us to our friends on the other side, of fifty years of proven incompetency, the powers of this country to carry out the wishes of this people. But I summon a gentleman as a witness to the essential excellence of these rules, as a witness to the essential excellence of this Speaker, as a witness to the efficiency of the House of Representatives, in which many of you took part—I summon as a witness——

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FASSETT. One question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. FASSETT. I yield for one question.

Mr. HAUGEN. We have now been in session for three months and a half, and I would like to ask the gentleman how many of President Taft's recommendations have been acted upon? [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FASSETT. Every one of them, Mr. Speaker, is well on its way to mature perfection. Mr. Taft's policies do not call for explosive dynamics, do not require to be put upon the public green and raw; they require, as the policies of Mr. Roosevelt required, the ripening and mature cooperation of the dignified and orderly procedure of committees, excellently selected, and of the Committee of the Whole House, and of both of the Houses of the American Congress.

Mr. HAUGEN. May I ask the gentleman another question about the selection of committees?

Mr. FASSETT. No; the gentleman may not. The gentleman is not accustomed to so much muscular oratory. He is grateful for the attention he has received, and calling his witness he will summon him and then retire. In 1906, after a Congress during which there had passed much of the same sort of political persiflage as has characterized this session, at the end of which we heard the same Cassandra-like prophecies that now we hear, at which time we had been consigned to the same oblivion to which we are now to be consigned—and I pause to say, Mr. Speaker, that if prophecy could bring its own fulfillment, if anathema maranatha could effect its own curses, there would not to-day be, nor for the last twenty-five years have been, one single Republican left living in the House of Representatives.

But the eyes of the world are now centered upon the hunter returning from Africa, the great Republican [applause on the Republican side], the man who will go down in history as the one who, by his courage and his strength, with his party cooperating, emancipated civil communities from the improper control of great combinations of wealth and from the questionable practices of malefactors of great wealth—the man who spoke, the man who prophesied, the man who did, the man who fulfilled; a man clean, strong, aggressive, fearless, impetuous, bold, with heart of gold and a mind ever intent upon reaching the goal of useful service to the public. And it is that man whom I summon as my witness. In 1906 Theodore Roosevelt wrote a letter from Oyster Bay to Representative Watson, and in it occurred this paragraph:

> I feel that all good citizens who have the welfare of America at heart should appreciate the immense amount that has been accomplished by the present Congress organized as it is, and the urgent need of keeping this organization in power. With Mr. CANNON as Speaker, the House has accomplished a literally phenomenal amount of good work. It has shown a courage, good sense, and patriotism such that it would be a real and serious misfortune for the country to fail to recognize. To change the leadership and organization of the House at this time means to bring confusion upon those who have been successfully engaged in the steady working out of a great and comprehensive scheme for the betterment of our social, industrial, and civic conditions. Such a change would substitute a purposeless confusion, a violent and hurtful oscillation between the positions of the extreme radical and the extreme reactionary, for the present orderly progress along the lines of a carefully thought-out policy.
> The interests of this Nation are as varied as they are vast. Congress must take account, not of one national need, but of many and widely different national needs; and I speak with historic accuracy when I say that not in our time has any other Congress done so well in so many different fields of endeavor as the present Congress has done. No Congress can do everything. Still less can it, in one session, meet every need.

With the inspiration of a prophet, looking over events as they then existed, seeing the trend of the mountain chains of Republican performance, his words were informed with a vital and enduring truth that have outlived the day they were spoken, and they come ringing down the years to us now, just as applicable to our present situation as they were to the situation existing then.

To substitute disorganization for organization, to substitute disorder for order, to substitute personal whim for party responsibility, to substitute the desire of two minorities to become a majority for the legally elected majority, to bereave the American people of its duly elected majority, is just as wrong now as it was in 1906, and those men who are eager here to assert their independence on this side, it seems to me, should again do, as we have all done in the past, subordinate their personal preferences to the opinions of an overwhelming majority of their Republican associates. In the light of the greater need of the greater people outside, in the need for remedial legislation, in view of the voices summoning us from every valley, from every hill, from every industry, every enterprise, let us do our work as Republicans because the Republican people summoned us to it.

These summonses and these voices, the incarnate voice of the Republican people of the United States of America, should drown out and overwhelm and smooth down beneath their waves every unimportant difference, and we should unite, as representing the American people and as a majority that has been given the power to accomplish that which we set out to do, as Republicans. In spite of the promises, in spite of the cajoleries, in spite of the denunciations and maledictions, in spite of the prophecies of disaster that emanate from our eager opponents, let us remain true as a Republican majority. [Applause on the Republican side.] Gentlemen, fellow-Republicans, many of us have grown old and gray in the service. We never have before been confronted with so critical a time as now. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Aye, Mr. Speaker, I measure every word I say; the time is critical. The rejoicing of those men on the other side, because they think already they have the victory in their hands, who wish to destroy Republican prestige and Republican domination in the Nation, these all admonish us to fidelity to our oath of office, fidelity to our manhood, fidelity to fifty years of Republican history. Fair play with our constituents at home demands of us that we retain the control and exercise the control, as they elected us to do, as Republicans. For we shall be held responsible for the control of this branch of Congress as Republicans, and not as allies of the Democracy. We have no right to surrender our trust. [Loud and continued applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, with mingled feelings of diffidence and hope I rise to address the House. The opportunity for which we have labored long and earnestly is at hand. The overthrow, in part, of the Speaker's arbitrary power is now possible. Let us, therefore, force the issue and face the duty of the hour with the courage the cause demands.

Our cause is righteous. Public sentiment is with us. I see the beginning of the end of a long and arduous contest. For nearly three years it has been my chief purpose to study, to understand, and, so far as possible, to arouse sentiment here and elsewhere against these unjust, unfair, and arbitrary rules. In so doing I have sought to avoid personal notoriety or self-exploitation, preferring to remain a silent, but conscientious, student of general legislation, well knowing that it is not so much what one says here as how one votes here that counts for the general good.

Believing, however, that upon this matter I have special knowledge, I deem it my duty to reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FASSETT], who has charged some of us with the heinous crime of helping Democracy. I would ask the honorable gentleman if he thinks we act from unworthy motives? He must know how unpleasant is the duty before us; how difficult it has been made by the so-called regulars; how much we risk by provoking the displeasure of our party associates in pursuing our determined course. All that men prize here of patronage, of privilege, and of power we have had to forego for the sake of principle. Have we not been punished by every means at the disposal of the powerful House organization? Members long chairmen of important committees, others holding high rank—all with records of faithful and efficient party service to their credit—have been ruthlessly removed, deposed, and humiliated before their constituents and the country because, forsooth, they would not cringe or crawl before the arbitrary power of the Speaker and his House machine.

Plenty of proof is at hand. Let me cite an example or two. The distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] was made chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs by Speaker Henderson at the urgent request of President McKinley, because the Chief Executive desired a man at the head of that great committee who would not permit the exploitation of the Philippine Islands. What was done to him by the present Speaker? What was done to Mr. FOWLER, Mr. NORRIS, Mr. HAUGEN, and many others? The Speaker did not hesitate to swing the headsman's ax nor the regulars to rejoice when an insurgent's head fell into the basket.

The gentleman from New York says we have grievances. Aye, we have, and many; but the gentleman does not state that these grievances arose after we had begun this fight on the Speaker's power and for the restoration of representative government in the House. The gentleman well knows that we are not seeking self-interest. We are fighting for the right of free, fair, and full representation in this body for our respective constituencies. The so-called insurgent Republican represents as good citizenship as the regular does. The 200,000 or more citizens of the second district of Wisconsin have some rights of representation here under our Constitution. But what is that right under the despotic rules of this body? Merely the privilege to approve the will of a Representative from another State invested with despotic power under artificial, unfair, and self-made rules of procedure.

We know, indeed, by bitter experience what representation means under these rules. It means that we must stand by the Speaker, right or wrong, or suffer the fate that we have endured. Let no one accuse us, therefore, of an alliance with Democracy for unworthy purposes. We are fighting with our Democratic brethren for the common right of equal representation in this House, and for the right of way of progressive legislation in Congress; and we are going to fight on at any cost until these inestimable rights have been redeemed for the people. [Applause.]

The gentleman eloquently appealed to the spirit of party. I appeal to the spirit of country. Let me call the gentleman's attention to that part of George Washington's Farewell Address, in which he speaks of the spirit of party and the despotism it may lead to if unchecked. Looking with prophetic eye into the future, scanning the reefs and rocks upon which the new ship of state might founder, he sounded this warning to us and to unborn generations of Americans. Hear his words:

> I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular reference to the founding of them on geographical discriminations. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.
> The spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed, but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness and is truly their worst enemy.
> The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism.

This "spirit of revenge natural to party dissension," of which Washington warns us, has played its part in the creation of these rules and the parliamentary precedents that sustain the Speaker's despotic power.

I have had the opportunity and the desire to investigate this subject, and I pause here to say that the rules in themselves are not so objectionable, but that a few changes might work wonders, if it were not for the mass of complicated, inconsistent, and arbitrary decisions that have grown up, some of them even contradicting the rules in express terms, and all tending to enlarge the importance of the presiding officer and to lessen the representative power of the House.

The history of the rules, as studied under the light of the precedents, proves that they have grown up under the united influences of party spirit and self-interest, and thus has gradually been formed in the Speaker's office the despotism from which we are now in open rebellion.

How vividly Speaker Reed, when he was once in the minority, pictured the workings of this system, even in its infancy and youth; how "the few"—the Speaker and his lieutenants—"intrenched in the forms and usages," "the combination and concert of old Members knowing the rules," could "keep the many entirely out of control," "govern the House," "perpetuate their own rule," and thereby protect "vested interests and vested wrongs."

The eloquent gentleman from New York [Mr. FASSETT] says the majority must control, but what is the majority? Speaker Reed emphatically said:

> There is no greater fallacy than this idea that majority and minority are predicated of political parties only.

Why should the subject of the rules be a party matter? At what convention did the Republican party adopt the present rules of the House? The Speaker says he represents the majority. But how? He and his chief lieutenants—favorites or personal friends, a small minority within the majority—call themselves the party and then pass the word on to the rank and file of the Republican membership to line up or be punished. What is the controlling force? Party principles? No. The Speaker's power under the rules—his patronage, the appointment of all committees, the 56 desirable chairmanships, the control of recognition on the floor, the close corporation of the Committee on Rules consisting of the Speaker himself and his two assistants—all these forces unite to form an autocracy against which we are in rebellion to-day. We are no less Republicans because we would be free Members of Congress. We do not need to be kept in leading strings. We are free representatives of the people, and we want freedom here for every Member of every party. [Applause.]

I wish to read a few more words from Washington's Farewell Address:

> But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual, and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purposes of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.
> Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind—which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight—the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.
> It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasionally riot and insurrection. * * *
> There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true, and in governments of a monarchical cast patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose, and there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be by force of public opinion to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming it should consume.

These words of Washington make it clear that party spirit and not patriotism sustains the Speaker's autocracy. Love of party is good; love of country is better. The right should stand before reelection; and so believing, many of us have chosen to accept ostracism here from place and power and to risk defeat at home to change these rules. Has not the press been filled with the direst threats, inspired by the powers that be? Opponents are to be brought out against us, patronage to be taken away, and campaign funds to be used to effect our defeat; and all this because we would not bend our necks to the Speaker's yoke.

But the House machine is not the Republican party. We have no cause to fear. The people are with us. Now that the issue has been presented; now that the opportunity is at hand to amend these rules in one vital respect, let us do so, and perhaps help save the Republican party. If we go home to our constituents and tell them that these rules are still in force and that they are to stay in force, what will be their verdict? If we liberalize these rules now, if we change them by enlarging the Committee on Rules and disqualifying the Speaker from membership upon it, as is proposed by the pending resolution, to that extent we eliminate this issue from the campaign; and what is vastly more important, we make it easier to secure progressive legislation in the House, redeem our platform pledges, and prove our party faithful to its high trust.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FASSETT] has read a letter by President Roosevelt, which he seeks to construe as an indorsement of the work of the House under these rules and the present Speaker. This letter was written four years ago for campaign purposes. It is true that the railway rate bill, the pure-food bill, and the meat-inspection bill had been favorably acted upon by Congress, but is there a man here who does not know that these great measures for the betterment of conditions among the people were forced through this House by the "big stick" in spite of the rules and the Speaker? Ido not wish to violate any of the proprieties, but I know that President Roosevelt gave a subsequent indorsement under the promise that his policies would be enacted into law—a promise that was never performed. I know something of the feelings and thoughts of one President, although the impropriety of relating a conversation with him prevents me from giving them expression. I will say, however, as an offset to what the gentleman would have us believe, that there will be no commendation, in my judgment, for these rules, either from the former President or, for that matter, by the present one.

Mr. Speaker, I feel deeply on this subject. I have long been interested in it. I believe I can say without immodesty that I was the first Republican to raise this issue before the Congress and before the country. More than two years ago, after having studied the history of our rules, and what others have said on this subject, and after making comparison with the parliamentary practices of other nations, I first discussed these rules in a public address before my constituents, and then at the first session of the Sixtieth Congress I deliberately sought to make their revision a paramount national issue. Unceasingly, persistently, and self-sacrificingly I have labored to bring this issue to a head. And I rejoice that the crisis has come. I welcome it. Let there be no faint hearts nor drooping courage nor spirit of compromise among us. The conflict is irrepressible. Let us meet it now like men.

We seek to redress a grievous wrong. No such usurpation of power exists in any other parliamentary nation. Elsewhere the occupant of the chair is an impartial presiding officer. Elsewhere the rules have been worked out on a basis of equality. No man has more opportunity, more rights, or more freedom than his colleagues. But with us it is a matter of privilege; here legislation goes by favor, and the Speaker is the dispenser of opportunity and power. He is the hub of the parliamentary wheel, his lieutenants are the spokes, and the House revolves around him.

We wish to change this arbitrary, artificial, and unrepublican system. We do not desire to deprive any Member of rights. We wish merely some rights for ourselves. We Republicans who protest against the Speaker's domination do not wish to put the gentlemen on the other side into control of the House. Outside of this question we do not propose to act with them as a body. We have formed no permanent alliance. On matters of legislation each one of us will act as his conscience dictates. However, in the patriotic movement to restore legislative rights to the American people, we welcome gladly any help that will relieve us from the intolerable tyranny of one-man power in the House of Representatives. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it has been said that ours is a Government by party. It will be a sad day for the American Republic, in my judgment, when there are not at least two great parties; when the issues upon which men divide are not squarely put before the people.

One of the unfortunate conditions to-day in one section of our country, as man after man on that side has privately said to me, and I think they would not deny it now, that there is no adequate discussion of the great public questions in various States in the Union. As men have said: "The talk is all on one side." "Our people know but one side." "There is no discussion as you men in the North have." With us in the North it is a fight from start to finish on the propositions upon which the people divide. It is steel blade against steel blade. In the North the best minds and the best orators of the Democratic party are pitted against the best minds and the best orators in the Republican party, and we come to the capital with victory, whether Democrats or Republicans, upon the issues squarely fought out in the campaign.

Now, I disagree with the gentleman from Wisconsin. We need parties. On all questions we need a free, candid, intelligent discussion [applause]; South as well as North, East as well as West.

Another thing. It has been said that Congress is governed by committees. It can not be governed otherwise. As every man here knows, there will be chaos, to use a somewhat hackneyed phrase in the discussion this afternoon, unless the various interests committed to Congress are submitted to committees for careful, intelligent consideration before being reported to the House. And here is the chit of the Norris resolution. It provides a new method of appointment of what is conceded to be the most powerful committee in this House—the Committee on Rules. Gentlemen have quoted precedents. They have been cited for a hundred years or more back as to this way of appointing the committee.

But by this proposed action precedents are not all that is set aside. The condition that we had here yesterday and to-day, with a powerful, alert minority, seeking control and direction of legislation, allied with a minority of the majority, is in a way revolutionary. Under the Norris resolution the majority over there, with a small minority here, can name the committee that districts a State; that names the Committee on Rules. That is the situation. It is the milk in the cocoanut.

I am glad the Speaker has left the chair. May I say, in his absence, that I regret that any gentleman in this discussion has found it necessary to reflect upon him. Young men have attacked him here this afternoon who were unborn or babes in their cradles when he became a Member of this House. He stands to-day at the head of a magnificent column of more than 12,000 Americans, many of them among the most illustrious in our history, who have been Members of this House.

Having served longer in this body than any other man, living or dead, and with some of the most distinguished of our countrymen in his own time on that side and on this, I do not hesitate to say that he is to-day the same high-minded patriot, the same man who seeks the best interests of the whole people that he was when the whole Nation rang with plaudits to him two short years ago. The greatest commoner that this country has produced in a generation, if he lay in his casket before that desk to-morrow or next year or two years from now, no lips would be more eloquent in praise of his career than on that side. Words of eulogy would spring unbidden to your lips, and to the lips of men who have condemned him to-day as Speaker of the House, in response largely to that demand in the country that seems to look for a sacrifice. Let us, gentlemen, recognize the merits of our own, recognize the integrity, the uprightness, the patriotism of a man who for thirty-five years has sat in this Hall and sought to direct the legislation of the country along right lines; legislatively speaking, the wisest man to-day in public or private life; wiser as a legislator, with more knowledge of our political conditions past and present than the man beyond the seas or the President who speaks to-night in Chicago; the one the first citizen of the Republic; the other, as the gentleman from New York said, so lofty a pinnacle does he occupy that he is the cynosure of the eyes of the world. No, no, my countrymen; this is more than a mere party question of the hour. There is a principle involved far-reaching in its operation that concerns you Democrats as well as us Republicans. It is not for to-day; it is for the years that are ahead of us. And let us act by the cool judgment, not only of the past, but the possibilities of the future, that we may not have to reverse our decisions in the hour of defeat and disaster. [Applause.]

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I think the time has come for an exact statement of the question that is now pending before the House of Representatives.

A MEMBER. The only one?

Mr. MADISON. No; and I am not the only one that can state it. But I believe that the time has come when it ought to be stated. It has been charged here upon the floor that the result of the passage of this resolution means chaos. It has been charged that the result of the passage of this resolution means the passing of power from this side of the House to that. Both statements are absolutely incorrect. I want to say to you, as one man who has not hesitated to stand up and cast his vote with those who have been variously denominated "insurgents" and "populists," that if I thought my vote upon this resolution would have the effect of transferring the power or control of the House from this side of the House to that, I would never cast it, and neither would one of my associates who have been called insurgents. Now, what is before you? Stating it exactly, it means the enlargement of the Rules Committee and making the Speaker ineligible to membership, that is all. I want that statement clearly in the RECORD, in order that when we get out before the people this fall, when the question comes up as to whether I was a Republican or not, whether I attempted to transfer the power from this side to that, whether or not I was loyal to my party, and whether or not you, my Republican friends, were willing to stand for reform of the rules or not, your constituents may look you in the face and tell you exactly what it was that you voted on.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADISON. Not now; I will later.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was simply going to ask the gentleman a question as to what is before the House, and ask the gentleman to define it.

Mr. MADISON. All right.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is the question before the House a question of order or is it a question on the merits of the resolution?

Mr. MADISON. Ah, my friend, we have been discussing the merits too much for you to ask me that question now.

Mr. DOUGLAS. What is the question before the House? Is it a question of the orderly procedure of the business of this House or is it a question concerning the merits?

Mr. MADISON. Answering my friend, who knows it to be true, in the final analysis it must come to a question of the reform of the rules of the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. After the Democratic applause has subsided, I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not he believes that this is a privileged resolution under the rules of this House or not?

Mr. MADISON. I will answer the gentleman by saying, as did my friend who replied to him some time ago, and I answer it with all sincerity and fairness, that under the rules as they have been qualified and modified by the action of this House to-day, yes.

Now, I am going to give him an answer as to the legal question. The Constitution of the United States provides that the House may determine the rules for its procedure. Whether it is a general parliamentary usage, whether it is a long, intricate system of rules, no other body on earth may determine it but us, and if any court was passing on the question of interpretation of the word "may" it would read it "shall."

So I have no hesitancy as a lawyer in answering the question. Now, then, gentlemen, there is the proposition before you. That is what you have got to meet face to face, and I hope that every man will stay here, and that before this legislative day ends, and without adjournment, the question will be settled and settled right. [Applause.]

The amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska means only this: That this House shall elect three men, and those three men shall divide the country first into nine legislative groups of equal size for the majority Members, and each one of those groups shall name a member of the Committee on Rules; then the Members of the minority shall be divided into six groups, and each one of those groups shall name a member of the Committee on Rules, who will constitute the Committee on Rules; and that the Speaker shall be ineligible for membership on that committee.

How many are there who have to-day been characterized as "Populists?" We could control one member of the committee if we were all thrown into one group, which under any geographical division is absolutely impossible.

Now, then, are you turning the House over to the Democrats with the insurgents under such a system? It is absolutely physically impossible. Let every man understand that.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MADISON. Not now; wait until I get through. You could not do it, so that in its final analysis the question that is presented to our Democratic friends is whether or not they will stand up and be true to the declaration of their platform. [Applause.] I wait and the country waits their action. The bugle note of reform is not being sounded in this instance by a Democrat, but by a Republican from the prairie State of Nebraska. [Applause.] If this resolution is carried, it will not be a Democratic resolution, but a resolution written by a Republican hand; a resolution worked out by such men as NORRIS of Nebraska, COOPER of Wisconsin, GARDNER of Massachusetts, and men of that character, who are just as loyal to Republicanism as any man within the sound of my voice. And, gentlemen, it is obvious that the adoption of this resolution does not mean the transfer of power to the Democrats. All know that it means a committee of 15 men to appeal to to permit the passage of necessary legislation instead of 1 man. [Applause.]

The one-man power, the history of the world has proven, is not the ideal system. You will have a more responsive committee. My friend from New York [Mr. FISH] will get more of a response from the fifteen men than he will from the one. Without attempting to cast any aspersions upon the other members of the Committee on Rules, whom I respect as good men and able legislators, it is a fact that, under the present system, the Speaker is the Committee on Rules. That system has existed not alone for the time that the present Speaker has been in the chair—for in all fairness and justice it should be said he did not originate this system—but for a long time before the chair of the presiding officer was occupied by JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, the Speaker of the House of Representatives has been, as he is to-day, the Rules Committee. There is no need of denying that the Speaker is the controlling force on the Committee on Rules. There is no need of getting up here and saying it is not true. Every man knows that it is true; and the question that you are to vote on is this, Will you substitute the fifteen men chosen by yourselves to determine the question as to what matters shall come here on the floor of the House of Representatives or will you leave it to one? And you can not go home and say that that is not the situation.

It is all right for my friend from New York [Mr. FASSETT] to speak in flowers of rhetoric with regard to the history of the Republican party and the marvelous good that it has accomplished and the necessity of holding it together for the upbuilding and the development of this country. God knows I believe in that. I believe that the prosperity and the happiness and the well-being of my country is wrapped up in the success of the Republican party, and I want it to prevail. But in order to prevail it must be worthy of the trust and confidence of the American people, and, gentlemen, just as sure as the sun rises in the east to-morrow morning, just that sure will there be a Republican Congress here to greet the next Speaker of the House of Representatives if you pass this resolution, and we can go before the country and say that we have applied the proper check upon the power of the Speaker and that the House of Representatives is what the fathers of the Constitution designed it to be—a truly representative body. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him a question. I would like to get the gentleman's interpretation of this resolution he has been debating. No reference is made to political parties whatever. The word "Republican" or the word "Democrat" is not mentioned in the resolution. Something is said about a committee of three, to be selected, which would have authority to district the majority States into nine districts and the minority States into six districts. I should like to get the gentleman's view as to what would be the meaning of that resolution as to what the majority should be.

Mr. MADISON. There is no question about it. It does not say the majority. It says the members of the majority party.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I think it does not.

Mr. MADISON. If that is not true, it is a mere matter of verbal omission.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If that is not in the resolution, would not a natural interpretation be that if a majority, consisting of Democrats and Republicans, should see fit to pass this amendment, that that majority would have the nine districts set apart to them?

Mr. MADISON. No. If there is anything in such interpretation, it is not meant; and I will say to the gentleman—I do not know whether the gentleman from Nebraska is here or not—that there will be no question about amending it so that it does state the identical principle which I laid down here.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Then the idea the gentleman entertains as to the meaning of this resolution, or the resolution as it ought to be amended if it is not clear now, would be that there should be nine Republican districts and six Democratic districts.

Mr. MADISON. Absolutely so. There is no question about that.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I have been very much pleased with the gentleman's declaration, and I feel assured of his loyaly and fidelity to the Republican party. I would like to know, supposing this resolution prevails, whether the gentleman would feel called upon to vote with the Democrats on the other side and with certain Republicans on this side in the selection of the committee of three?

Mr. MADISON. I should vote with my party—the Republican party—and I would be perfectly willing to go into a Republican caucus for the purpose of selecting those members.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADISON. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. I did not hear the resolution read, but I have a copy of it in my hands now.

Mr. MADISON. I have it here.

Mr. SCOTT. I have a copy of it now. I see it provides that the States of the Union shall be divided by a committee of three, elected by the House for that purpose. I should like to ask my colleague whether it is the purpose to divide that committee of three on party lines and whether any method is marked out for the election of that committee?

Mr. MADISON. By the House. My understanding is it is to be elected by the House.

Mr. TAWNEY. Where is the line to be drawn on that? Is there any designation whether all shall be Republicans?

Mr. MADISON. Not at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. They might all be of either party.

Mr. MADISON. Yes. Now, then, I want to answer the gentleman's question——

Mr. TAWNEY. I am asking for information.

Mr. MADISON. I understand it. The States of the Union must be divided into groups, the Republican party into nine groups and the Democrats into six.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The six Democratic groups include the entire country?

Mr. MADISON. And so does the nine Republican groups.

Mr. GAINES. I understand that they are selected geographically?

Mr. MADISON. Yes.

Mr. GAINES. Where would that leave the Republicans from Virginia, from North Carolina, from South Carolina, and Tennessee in the selection of their representatives on this committee? They would be turned over, I presume, for their representation to the tender mercies of the gentlemen of the South, excellent gentlemen, but who do not agree with us. I trust the gentleman from Kansas does not agree with that.

Mr. MADISON. That statement is absolutely incorrect; unintentionally so, of course. There will not be under this resolution, under the aim and purpose of the gentleman from Nebraska, who can answer better than I, a Democrat in a Republican group, or a Republican in a Democratic group.

Mr. GAINES. But you said they were to be selected geographically. Now, how do you figure that out?

Mr. FOWLER. The Republicans meet by themselves and the Democrats by themselves.

Mr. MADISON. I stated the proposition exactly. The whole country will be divided into nine groups for the Republicans and six groups for the Democrats. Each one of those groups will elect a member of the Committee on Rules. Now, then, the question has been asked with reference to the three Members who will divide the country into districts. So far as I am concerned I do not care who selects them. The gentleman from Nebraska said, and I agree with him, that we will vote and work for the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER], if you please, to be the man to select these groups. Why? Because it does not make any difference who does it. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Kansas yield to me for the purpose of submitting to the House a request?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OLMSTED). Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. MADISON. In a moment. Mr. Speaker, in the enthusiasm of the moment I was led to make a statement I did not intend to make. [Laughter.] There is no man in the House who is more respected and more entitled to respect than the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER], and it was really because of the fact that I felt that he would be absolutely fair that I made use of his name.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I suggest this is St. Patrick's Day, and that was a sort of Irish bull which the gentleman made.

Mr. MADISON. I think it must be the shade of St. Patrick, the patron saint of so many good Irishmen, who is hovering over us to-day, as there is so much fighting in the House of Representatives. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Kansas if he will permit me in his time to submit to the House a request?

Mr. MADISON. I yield the floor now. I have not the floor any longer.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, it is manifest that the discussion of the merits of this proposition will continue for some length of time. The first question to be determined is the question of order, and that is to be determined by the Speaker, and then, perhaps, by the House. If the point of order is overruled and the ruling of the Chair is not sustained, or is appealed from and that ruling is not sustained, then comes the merits of this proposition, which is of the greatest importance to both sides of this House.

And in view of the time that would necessarily be consumed in the consideration of the merits of the proposition, I want to ask unanimous consent to adjourn the House until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. HARDWICK. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. NORRIS. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON] has the floor.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; he yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] moves that the House take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FISH. On that I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to suggest before the gentleman puts his motion, that I recognize the fact that the debate on this question ought to proceed as long as gentlemen desire to debate it. But I am not trying to curtail debate. But we are discussing the merits of the question here when, as a matter of fact, there is nothing before the House except a point of order. Now, we can not ask the Speaker, of course, to pass on it until he says he is ready. It is in the province of the Speaker to say in his discretion whether he will hear this debate or not. It is supposed to be for his benefit. Now, the decision as to whether or not the Speaker is ready to rule ought to be made, and then if the parliamentary contingency arises that the gentleman has suggested, we can perhaps make an agreement.

Mr. KEIFER. There are other questions before you come to the merits of the proposition after this is disposed of.

Mr. TAWNEY. My proposition was made in the utmost good faith.

Mr. NORRIS. We can not determine that unless we know whether the Speaker is ready to rule.

Mr. MANN. I want to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not believe the Speaker is ready to rule. Of course there is no power to compel the Speaker to rule.

Mr. NORRIS. I admit that.

Mr. TAWNEY. So that, in all human probability, the debate may run practically all night or several days. It can be taken up to-morrow and continued in this legislative day. I submit, in all candor, that this matter is a matter of the utmost importance, and we ought not to be called upon to determine the merits of a proposition of this vast magnitude in the House of Representatives without careful consideration. And I do not think that anybody will be able to force a decision one way or the other on the merits of the proposition. Now, it is only for the purpose of having it considered in a proper legislative manner that I have made the suggestion that we take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say to the gentleman that I shall make no objection to an adjournment, but I think if the Speaker is ready to rule that we ought to have the parliamentary situation passed on to-night.

Mr. MANN. I want to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. There are a number of gentlemen that want to be heard on the merits of the point of order.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There has been no opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. MANN. I ask the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] whether he thinks, in adopting a reform issue of this size, he can afford to apply the gag?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not tried to apply it.

Mr. MANN. You will if you endeavor to force the House.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman will have to concede this, that this discussion that has been taking place is not on a question before the House. So we are not making any progress. Now, this debate, with the exception of one or two speeches that were made, was not on the merits of the proposition before the House.

Mr. MANN. I take it, that in a matter of this importance, involving as much as it does, that Members of the House who want to be heard ought to be heard.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HARDWICK. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, that the House take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FISH. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142, nays 147, answered "present" 12, not voting 88, as follows:

YEAS—142.

So the House refused to take a recess.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. SHEFFIELD with Mr. WEISSE.

Mr. MADDEN with Mr. SPARKMAN.

Mr. ESCH with Mr. MACON.

Mr. CROW with Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey.

For the balance of the day:

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania with Mr. GOLDFOGLE.

Until Wednesday a. m.:

Mr. GREENE with Mr. BARTLETT of Nevada.

On this vote:

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia with Mr. RIORDAN.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I was present and listening, and did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman paying attention?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Yes, sir; I was paying attention.

The SPEAKER. When it should have been called?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Call the name of the gentleman.

The name of Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska was called, and he voted "Nay."

Mr. BYRD. Mr. Speaker, I was present and ought to have heard my name called, but did not.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman giving attention?

Mr. BYRD. I was. My name is so easily blended with that of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] that I did not hear it.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman giving attention?

Mr. BYRD. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. And did not hear his name called?

Mr. BYRD. And did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Call the name of the gentleman.

The name of Mr. BYRD was called, and he voted "nay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Speaker, it had not been my purpose to take part in this debate, and I would not except for the remarks of my colleague from New York [Mr. FISH]. The question involved has reference only, as I take it, first, as to how the Committee on Rules shall hereafter be appointed, and, second, the proposition that the Speaker shall be ineligible to appointment on that committee.

It is a fact well understood by all that in no legislative body in this country where a rules committee is provided for the speaker is excluded from membership on that committee or prohibited from the appointment of such a committee, as he does all other committees. This, therefore, is a new departure, a departure which deprives the official head of the House of Representatives from appointing the most important of all of its legislative committees. So rigorous is the rule proposed to be adopted here that the Speaker is to be excluded from membership on that committee. From the foundation of our Government up to the present time no such rule has ever prevailed, and I think it has not prevailed in any one of the 46 legislative bodies which constitute the States forming this great Union. What are the conditions to-day which so materially differ from conditions which have existed for a century and a quarter of time that now there should be a different rule adopted than that which all our forefathers found to be essential to the orderly administration of the affairs of our Government?

I will not take up the time of the House in trying to point out the necessity for having a final body so constituted that it can control legislation, for I think it must be conceded by all that there must rest somewhere a body which has the power to finally determine what legislation shall be given consideration and what shall not. I think it is within the knowledge of every Member of this body that there is in almost every committee in this House of Representatives a class of legislation which might pass this body if reported, but which would be to the very last degree injurious to the Union itself. Being a member of the judiciary body of this House, I think I can say that if all of the bills before that body now and during the last session were reported and passed upon favorably, as I have some reason to believe would be the case, they would absolutely destroy this present republican form of government.

There must therefore of necessity reside somewhere a brake on this kind of legislation. The Speaker of the House of Representatives is the spokesman not only for the majority of its Members, but he stands as the spokesman and the responsible head of whatever party is in control during the time that he occupies that office. If he has the responsibility of legislation, he should have the power to control it.

I regret very much that I am not able to agree with the remarks of my distinguished colleague and friend from New York [Mr. FISH]. Both of us have served for many years in the legislature of the State of New York, and are familiar with its rules and regulations. While we do not have 20,000 or 30,000 bills introduced into the legislature of the State of New York, yet we have about 4,000 bills introduced annually in both branches of the legislature of our native State.

It became necessary there, and did in the gentleman's time and mine, to have some power, some authority vested somewhere, by which we might select that legislation which we believed was in the interest of the public and stop the other legislation which we did not believe was in the interest of the public.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman give way for a question?

Mr. MALBY. Certainly.

Mr. FISH. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York whether that time is not simply the last ten days of the session?

Mr. MALBY. Oh, I am coming to the ten days' proposition. I have the rule before me, and I was about to read it. My friend from New York [Mr. FISH] knows just as well as I know that during the last ten days of the session of the legislature of the State of New York more bills are passed than during the entire session preceding those ten days, it mattering not how long the session continues. The rule under which Speaker Fish presided for two years in the New York assembly reads as follows:

> During the last ten days of the session a notice may be given requesting that any matter be made a special order, or that the rules be suspended for the purpose of reading a bill out of its order, which shall be referred without debate to the committee on rules. The member making the motion or giving the notice shall submit in writing the reasons for making such special order or suspension and attach thereto a copy of the bill. The committee may report at any time, and such report shall stand as the determination of the house unless otherwise ordered by a vote of two-thirds of the members present. The committee shall not be instructed by the house to report any matter or special order, or to report that the rules be suspended for the purpose of reading a bill out of its order, except by a vote of two-thirds of the members present.

That, Mr. Speaker, in my judgment and experience, is a wholesome rule. It is a necessary rule in a legislative body where 4,000 bills are introduced. But it means that the power of every committee of the assembly of the State of New York during the last ten days of the session is absolutely suspended. There is not a single committee in the New York assembly that has the power to make a report within ten days of the end of the session when the majority of all legislation is passed.

But it means something more. The rule says on request being made for a report of a bill without debate no member of the New York state legislature has a right to rise in his place during the last ten days of a session, when legislation of importance is passed, and make a single word of argument why his bill should or should not be passed. A member files with the committee on rules his written reasons why he asks for a favorable report, together with a copy of his bill, and when the rules committee convenes, of which the speaker is the chairman, they report or do not report the bill, just as they please and without debate.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman give way for a moment?

Mr. MALBY. I will.

Mr. FISH. As I recollect, the assembly has 150 members in it.

Mr. MALBY. It does now.

Mr. FISH. How many compose the committee on rules out of the 150?

Mr. MALBY. I think 5 out of the 150, thereby recognizing, as we have recognized in the House of Representatives, the absolute necessity of having a small committee in order to transact the important business of our native State. We would find here as there that a committee of 15 would be an unwieldy body, impossible to get together; impossible if convened to agree on any given proposition; impossible to progress with the business of this House, which this country positively and constantly demands. That is why a committee of 5 is had in the State of New York and should be continued here.

But there is something more in this New York rule, and I commend it. I worked under it for a great many years, and so did my friend from New York [Mr. FISH]. I found it in the interest of good legislation and the State, and I think he found it so too. Let me read for a moment more:

> The committee may report at any time, and such report shall stand as the determination of the house.

What does that mean? That means that when the committee on rules has reported a bill to the assembly of the State of New York you can not dot an "i" or cross a "t" without a vote of two-thirds of the members present. That is what that rule means. Now, what does that suggest? Why, it suggests the necessity for the rule that when these bills have passed the careful scrutiny and review of the committee on rules that it is not wise to permit the general body to which they had been delivered to amend it in any way, shape, or manner, unless by a two-thirds vote.

But it means more. The committee on rules, it says, shall not be instructed by the house to report any matter except by a two-thirds vote.

You can not instruct the rules committee of the State of New York to report upon any resolution or bill unless you can get two-thirds of the members present to vote in the affirmative.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. MALBY. I will.

Mr. GOULDEN. The members of the New York legislature, both in the senate and the house, have a right to explain their vote upon every roll call, as I understand it.

Mr. MALBY. My friend is mistaken about that. They have in the senate, but not in the house, as I now recall it.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does the gentleman think it would be a good rule to follow here? Would it not tend to give satisfaction to the Members?

Mr. MALBY. I am not discussing that proposition; I am simply giving you the rules of the New York state assembly.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman from New York give way for a moment?

Mr. MALBY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FISH. Is it not a fact in the assembly of the State of New York it is within the power of the house, at any time when a committee reports, to move to discharge the committee from the consideration of any bill?

Mr. MALBY. It is not in order, and the gentleman from New York, the ex-speaker of the assembly, knows that it is not in order, to move to discharge any committee from the consideration of a bill during the last ten days of the session.

Mr. FISH. At any other time except the last ten days of a session?

Mr. MALBY. At any other time the rules provide that on the call of a committee a motion is in order to discharge the committee, except during the last ten days of a session.

Mr. FISH. That is entirely different from the rules of this House.

Mr. MALBY. I am not making a general comparison between the rules of the New York state assembly and the rules of the House of Representatives. I am trying to demonstrate that the authority which may be and is exercised by the committee on rules of the New York assembly, which has from time to time received the approval of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], far exceeds that of the present rules of the House of Representatives.

I might agree with my friend from New York [Mr. FISH] that the rules of this House might be simplified so that he and I could understand them better, but I want to say to him that we would understand them a good deal better if we spent more time in studying the rules than in criticising them.

Mr. FOELKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MALBY. Yes.

Mr. FOELKER. Is it not a fact that the committee on rules in the New York state assembly does not only act within the last ten days, but sometimes acts for four or five weeks at a time?

Mr. MALBY. Not at all. The gentleman is entirely mistaken about that, and if it did it would only demonstrate the necessity for such action.

Mr. FOELKER. I want to say, as a matter of fact, that I have seen and I have sat in the legislature where the committee on rules has acted for four weeks instead of ten days.

Mr. MALBY. I know that that is so, and why is that? It is simply because the assembly of the State of New York has passed a resolution to adjourn and the senate has not agreed to that motion to adjourn, and the ten days is calculated by the members of the assembly from the date agreed upon by them for adjournment, and that is the reason why they are in control not only ten days, but sometimes a month before final adjournment.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does the gentleman consider the rules of the assembly and the senate of the State of New York superior to the rules of the House of Representatives?

Mr. MALBY. I consider this, Mr. Speaker: I consider that the rules of the assembly and the senate of the State of New York, which provide for a rules committee, are far more far-reaching and vigorous than anything which the House of Representatives of the United States ever had.

Mr. GOULDEN. Then there is no majority rule there as there is here. It is a two-thirds rule the last ten days of the session, is it not?

Mr. MALBY. Oh, we have a majority rule, certainly, but not during the last ten days. Our rules, as a general thing, work well. I am not criticising them.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does the gentleman think there is as much deliberation and freedom in the exercise of those rules as in the rules of this House?

Mr. MALBY. The gentleman means the rules as a whole?

Mr. GOULDEN. Yes.

Mr. MALBY. I think owing to the size of the body, there being but 150 members in the assembly and 51 senators now in the senate, that the opportunity for deliberation is larger there than it is here.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York is not discussing the point of order that is before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman and all gentlemen who have talked to this point of order have not talked under the hour rule. I suppose it is within the power of the Speaker at any time to stop this discussion, but gentlemen on both sides of the House, both the majority and the minority, and the minority of the majority side, have talked about many things far away from the point of order, and the Chair has not stopped them, presuming from the action of the House that it is the temper of the House to give freedom of expression. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Speaker, if I have not sufficiently interested my friend in proceeding in my own way, I will do the best I can to please him. I desire to call attention to another rule of the assembly of the State of New York, which I commend, rule 3:

> The speaker shall appoint all committees except where the house shall otherwise order.

I approve of that provision. It is a rule which has been in vogue, so far as my recollection goes, since the foundation of our state government. It will probably remain just as long as New York is one of the sovereign States of this Union.

Thus we have, at least in the Empire State, a legislative body which provides for a committee on rules. It provides that the speaker shall appoint all members of that committee. He always appoints himself the chairman, and my friend from New York [Mr. FISH] did so when he was the speaker of the house, and he ought to have done so. He was the responsible head, and he should, as he did, have the power to control legislation through his committee on rules. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. FOELKER. Is it not a fact that the senate in the State of New York three years ago appointed its own committees, and not the president of the senate?

Mr. MALBY. Yes. Now, that is a nice question for my friend from New York to ask. Unfortunately for my dear old home State, three years ago it elected a Democratic lieutenant-governor, who, under the rules, had the right to appoint the committees of the senate, subject to the right of the senate to appoint them; and it being a Republican senate, which was responsible to the people for legislation, they declined to permit a Democratic lieutenant-governor to appoint the committees.

Mr. GOULDEN. Did the gentleman justify that departure from sound principles in the government of the New York state senate, when a good, honest, fearless man was elected lieutenant-governor, to take out of his hands the prerogatives which always belonged to that office just because of politics?

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] a question——

Mr. MALBY. I can not yield for that, Mr. Speaker. I want to say that the rules of the senate of the State of New York provide that the lieutenant-governor shall appoint the committees, subject to the approval of the senate, and the senate did not approve. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOULDEN. Simply because of his politics, I take it.

Mr. MALBY. Simply because of his politics, and the responsibility of a Republican senate to the people for legislation.

Mr. GOULDEN. And for no other reason.

Mr. MALBY. No other reason that I know of, except we did not propose to have a Democratic lieutenant-governor appoint the committees of the senate of the State of New York when he had no responsibility for legislation. Now, that is not an unusual thing, because it has worked both ways in the senate of the State of New York, depending only upon which party is in power. The rules of the senate of the State of New York provide, as I stated, that the lieutenant-governor shall appoint the committees, subject always to the approval of the senate itself. So, Mr. Speaker, I am unable to agree with my colleague from New York. We usually agree upon great Republican principles, because he and myself have ever supported the principles of that party at home. I know of no reasons why we should not support the principles of that party here.

I can not recognize any other rule than that of the majority. I can not recognize the right of a minority of my party to control a majority of my party. We are either a party of majorities or we are nothing. When your resolution provides that the majority party shall appoint 9 members and the minority party 6 members, I would like to have some one tell me what that rule means. Who is the majority party in the House of Representatives to-day? The accredited Republican party upon all of the votes which have taken place to-day and yesterday, who are held responsible to this great country for legislative matters, have found themselves in the minority. Who, then, is to appoint the 9 members? Is it our Democratic friends with an alliance of a small minority of so-called Republicans? Are they to constitute the majority, and are they to determine who the 3 members shall be, and are the 3 members to determine who the 15 members shall be? If that be so, where does the Republican party, who is responsible to the people in the Congress of the United States, come in? And that is just exactly what is intended, to be perfectly frank. There is no question about it. It is not intended that the Republican majority in this Congress shall control the appointment of the members of this committee. It is not intended that they shall appoint the 9. It is intended, and I charge it to be a fact, that the minority, the Democracy and their Republican allies who are dissatisfied with the majority, shall get together and determine every single one of the members of the Committee on Rules. That is the object and that is the purpose, which everybody can clearly see.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I have consumed all of the time I desire. I wanted to call the attention of the House to the fact that at least so far as my native State was concerned that it has had for all of the time that I have known anything about it a rules committee appointed by the speaker, who appointed himself its chairman, which is vested with much more power than is conferred by these rules. And, more than that, no resolution or bill can be debated before our New York State committee on rules, and they may report or not, as they please, and can not be discharged except by a two-thirds vote. I have no fault to find with it. We have found it, after years of trial and experience, to be a matter of necessity, just as the House of Representatives will find it to be a matter of necessity if any other proposition such as that involved in this resolution is unfortunate enough to be adopted.

Mr. FOELKER. Mr. Speaker, I know of no more important question than the one that has presented itself to this body, since our predecessors in this Chamber wrestled with the legislative problems antecedent to, during, and immediately succeeding the civil war.

It goes to the very root of popular self-government and its determination here will pass out as our opinion, whether this is a deliberative body or merely an automaton to be manipulated according to the views of a single individual, and he one of us. [Loud applause.]

Here is a body consisting of 391 Members, of perhaps varying ability, but each, under the Constitution, intended to have equal powers with the others, and while each represents a separate and independent constituency, together we act for a nation now of quite 90,000,000 of people, extending from semi-tropical southern California, which borders upon our neighbor, Mexico, far into the arctic circle of our Alaskan possessions, and from Maine to Florida. Besides these, we must justify ourselves to those inhabitants of our insular possessions, who, sooner or later, will become citizens with us.

Strange to say that one of us, sent here to represent a single district, has now become so powerful that he is regarded as the second man in the Nation. While the Constitution provides that "the House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers" (Art. I, sec. 2, clause 5), it does not give him any more influence or power. The power he has and does wield is entirely out of all proportion to the place he holds; it is a power fundamentally and diametrically opposed both to the spirit and letter of the Constitution, and is a distant menace to a representative form of government. The Speaker of the House of Representatives or the presiding officer of any deliberative body can not, in the very nature of things, be what he should be—the impartial parliamentarian who holds the scales of deliberative justice with even, dispassionate hands and does equal justice to the majority and the minority—if he has the power and assumes the sole responsibility of shaping legislation. Clause 2 of section 5, Article I of the Constitution, distinctly says:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, etc.

Mark you, each House may determine. But what do we find the actual practice? In determining the rules to govern our proceedings we have provided for a presiding officer, whom we call Speaker.

The powers and duties of this officer were intended, so far as he is presiding officer, to follow those of the speakership of the House of Commons. There, however, the selection of speaker is made of the person who is deemed best qualified for the office, without regard to his politics, and frequently, Parliament after Parliament, although changing with the different political parties, the same speaker has been kept in power. He is and was the speaker because, when occasion came to address the King or the House of Lords on any matters pertaining to legislation, he speaks for the body over which he presides, and his appointment is made with at least the nominal, if not actual, approval of the King. But he has no such powers as we have conferred upon our presiding officer, and would soon find himself subject to impeachment and removal were he to arrogate to himself any such as are sought to be exercised here.

At the beginning of each session it has been the custom to adopt the rules of the preceding Congress, subject always to change. These provided for the election of a Speaker, and upon the Speaker is conferred the power of naming the committees to which, as preliminary to the action of the entire body, are committed the various matters that may rightfully and constitutionally come before us. There has grown up, as part of this system, a committee on rules, consisting of five members, three of whom represent the majority and two the minority. These are also appointed by the Speaker, the Speaker himself being one of the majority and, in fact, the chairman of the committee. Thus it will be seen the entire committee is the creature of the Speaker, and that at all times, with the two votes of his own party together with his own, he can control such legislation as must be passed upon by this committee. Now, by another rule, by which we have further tied our hands, this committee of five, or three, or really one, as it often happens, can and does determine to what committee proposed legislation shall go and how and when it should be moved.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY] has somewhat criticised my friend Mr. FISH because he disagrees with him, and cites in his own behalf the rules of the assembly and senate of the State of New York. I am sure that if the rules of the House of Representatives were like those he read and did not read, although a part of them, Mr. FISH, myself, and all other so-called insurgents would be satisfied, and the Norris resolution would perhaps not be before the House to-day, for in the New York state assembly any committee may be discharged from the further consideration of any bill pending before it, which is impossible under the rules of this House. A member may also at any time, upon the final passage of a bill, explain his vote for or against a bill, which is not permissible in the House of Representatives.

Mr. MALBY also stated, in answering Mr. FISH, that—

Thus we have, at least in the Empire State, a legislative body which provides for a committee on rules. He always appoints himself the chairman, and my friend from New York [Mr. FISH] did so when he was the speaker of the house, and he ought to have done so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, Mr. MALBY is absolutely wrong in that statement, and I desire to call his attention to the rule as to the power of the speaker in the New York state assembly, which reads as follows:

8. He (the speaker) shall be ex officio member and chairman of the committee on rules.

Hence, Mr. FISH could not have appointed himself chairman of the committee on rules, but became so by reason of the rule just read.

A resolution has been introduced here, which is now before us, the purpose and object of which is not to do away with this Committee on Rules but to increase the number, so that it will be more representative in its character; that it should be composed of Members selected by the House itself and not appointed by the Speaker, and that the Speaker himself shall be confined to his more legitimate duties as a presiding officer. It is now proposed that this resolution, so consonant with the spirit of our Government, shall, before action be taken upon it by this body, be referred to this Speaker-appointed committee of five, or three, or one, to have it there determined whether they will return to this House the power with which they have heretofore been intrusted, or, following practice, withhold the matter from the consideration of the House and so perpetuate their own power, influence, and control.

It has been urged that this is according to precedent. A precedent to be worthy to be followed must be in harmony with the everlasting principles of our Government and traceable back to that which makes for life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Chancellor Kent, in commenting on the doctrine of stare decicis, called attention to the fact that up to his time more than 1,000 cases in English and American law that had at one time or another been pleaded as precedents had been overruled, doubted, or limited in their application. As has been well said, precedents are to be followed, unless flatly absurd, unjust, unreasonable, or clearly contrary to the fundamental law. Without any argument it seems to be self-evident that such attempted interferences by a Committee on Rules with the wishes of the majority of this House is such a usurpation of power as to be contrary to all received notions of our theory of government and revolutionary in its character. Instead of each House determining the rule of its proceedings, this committee of five, three, or one seeks to take upon itself this constitutional duty, to the exclusion of all of the other 390 Members here. "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings," says the Constitution, not that a committee of five, three, or one shall. To hold with those who are against us would be to make the servant greater than the master, and this committee as now constituted would be a veritable Frankenstein, which, while created by us for an entirely different purpose and tolerated until we conclude to make a change, is in a position to overwhelm us all.

Let me state a few concrete instances.

Preceding the last presidential campaign both parties declared in favor of a constitutional amendment which would permit of an income tax; and Congress promptly, almost unanimously, submitted to the several States a constitutional amendment permitting such legislation. The distinguished gentleman now in his second term as governor of the State of New York (I refer to Governor Hughes), an able lawyer, of unimpeachable and unquestioned integrity, pointed out what he believed to be embarrassing defects in the resolution proposed to be submitted.

Whether Governor Hughes is right or wrong, no one for a moment questions but that, in presenting his views, he acted in the best of good faith and, as he believed, not only in the interest of the people of his own State, but, being a statesman of broad views, gave them out for the consideration of every other State in the Union. It has been argued by some, with great force, that the resolution referred to did not necessarily authorize the legislation which Governor Hughes thought might follow this constitutional amendment. These gentlemen who so differ with Governor Hughes are just as earnest, honest, and sincere as he. I take pride in referring in that connection to our junior Senator, ELIHU ROOT, now serving the State of New York in the upper House in a manner which meets with the approval not only of his own party, but of the wise and patriotic leaders among our opponents. This debate caused a halt in legislative action and it has looked ever since as though the income-tax amendment might fall of a sufficient number of votes to make it part of the fundamental law. Seeing this, I prepared another resolution, intending to carry out in good faith the pledges made by both parties to the people on this subject, and at the same time obviating the objections of Governor Hughes, and to be in conformity with the opinions and the views of that able statesman, Senator ROOT, and generally put the country in a position where an income tax could be laid, if such necessity arose, such an amendment as would appeal to the public at large and to the patriotic men of both parties. Without something of the kind, I thought that the session would pass by without any authority being conferred upon Congress so to act. Hence the resolution which I have referred to as submitted by me.

Under existing conditions it will depend upon the Speaker whether my resolution shall ever get further than the files of the Committee on Rules. I have no doubt that many of my colleagues see where what I have suggested can be amended with advantage; but unless it meets with the views of the Speaker, our pledges to the people in this regard may be nullified and no constitutional authority granted upon this subject for many years to come. Whether it shall come before the House or not depends upon this self-appointed and self-perpetuating Committee on Rules.

We all know that the cost of living has advanced far in excess of the earnings of labor. Various reasons have been ascribed for this. It is our duty to find a remedy. Meanwhile and until these conditions could be adjusted—which will probably come only by increasing wages in proportion to the increase in the cost of living—I presented a bill (H. R. 19784) placing beef, mutton, lamb, and pork on the free list. Now, it will be observed that this was not done in the spirit of hostility to the policy of protection as proclaimed by my party, but in accordance with it, because it was intended to be in operation but for one year and until the causes of the difference between labor and living can be ascertained and adjusted. This would permit our working people to draw supplies from Canada, our neighbor on the north, and avail ourselves of the cattle that throng the thousand hills of South America. It would save the workingman, for at least one year, from drawing on the little capital his self-sacrifice and prudence has laid aside for the education of his children and to provide against possible disease and the certainty of old age. Temporarily, I say, because in the end we must meet this problem in the spirit that should govern everyone having the interests of the country at heart. No nation can succeed where the difference between the cost of living on the one hand and the return from wages on the other make it impossible for the workingman to secure a competency.

Well, this bill went in some weeks ago (January 31, 1910). I have been written to and spoken to as to when it is likely to come before this body, and the only answer I have been able to give was that it rests with the Committee on Ways and Means, who, although written to requesting a hearing, have not even answered my letter. The Committee on Rules is the only one to which I can appeal for assistance, and that body will positively not come to my aid reporting a rule that this bill may properly come before the House, for such a report would in fact operate as a discharge of the Committee on Ways and Means from the further consideration of the bill. My former distinguished colleague, Mr. Hepburn, of Iowa, very properly said in a debate during the last session of the Sixtieth Congress:

> Ah, it is easy to get into the Committee on Rules, but by what hoist and by what petard would we get out of the Committee on Rules?

It has been said that we may offend somebody in doing as we propose to do. I am prepared to offend somebody—anybody and everybody who attempts in the slightest to interfere with or impair our constitutional rights or to subordinate the liberty of this my adopted country to any advantage to themselves or to others whom they would serve rather than the whole people. As was said on a similar occasion more than a hundred and sixty years ago:

> But Titus said, with his uncommon sense,
> When the exclusion bill was in suspense,
> "I hear a lion in the lobby roar.
> Say, Mr. Speaker, shall we shut the door
> And keep him there, or shall we let him in,
> To try if we can turn him out again?"

There are those about me who are loud in praises of those who are in authority, and, while agreeing with us so-called insurgents, refer to the controlling power if not in the language at least in the spirit of Lord Thurlow of more than one hundred and twenty years ago:

> When I forget my sovereign may my God forget me.

A fitting reply to those would be in the language of Wilkes:

> Forget thee? He'll see thee damned first.

Yes; I am willing to take my chances of answering to my constituents that I serve them here to the best of my ability and have no commission from them to be gagged and bound by any Committee on Rules.

It might be well for some of the gentlemen who were very severe in their strictures on those of us who did not agree with them in their desire to uphold the rules of the House and to keep unimpaired the domination of the Speaker in all legislation to examine their own records for party loyalty before throwing stones at others.

I refer to the gentlemen from New York, Messrs. CALDER, DWIGHT, FASSETT, and VREELAND, all of whom only a short time ago appeared in the rôle of pronounced reformers in our State when the question came up for the election of a president pro tempore of the New York state senate. They did everything in their power, and I was glad to see them do it, to support Senator Hinman, who is an able and a fearless legislator, for that position against Senator Cobb, the regular organization candidate. They evidently are reformers at home and regular organization men here.

The extreme devotion of these gentlemen to the House organization and to the rules of the House which subject all legislation to the tender mercies of the Speaker and his immediate coterie may find a warm indorsement here, but not at home.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, there is a very important matter in the House being considered at the present time, and it seems to me we should have a quorum, and I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. JAMES) there were—ayes 52, noes 60.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ROBERTS. I make the point of order that the motion discloses no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a sufficient number——

Mr. JAMES. The other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. There is not enough to make the other side. Evidently every Member who voted aye would order the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 108, nays 117, answered "present" 18, not voting 145, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. JAMES. There is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote just taken shows a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. REEDER. A parliamentary inquiry. Is the gentleman in order under the Constitution or under the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not able to hear the gentleman.

Mr. REEDER. I was questioning whether the gentleman was in order under the rules of the House or under the Constitution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Both.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I shall try to be in order on the question now before the House. That question, although merely seemingly a matter of order, is more important than any other subject that has been discussed in this debate. It is insisted, Mr. Speaker, that a motion to amend the rules may be brought before this House at any time by any Member as a matter of the highest constitutional privilege without previous reference to the Rules Committee, and that it shall be always in order. You gentlemen on the other side claim that you may be some time in the majority. I ask you, and I ask gentlemen on this side, how this House will do business at all if any Member in the minority can at any time move to amend the rules of this House, and that question must come up for debate, and for roll calls on the previous question, and on the question itself, supported by that minority. We talk about filibustering. No such means for a filibuster was ever framed as to say that a motion to amend the rules of this House can be brought forward by one Member at any time and that with the support of one-fifth of the House roll calls can be demanded.

A new rule is proposed as to the Rules Committee. What business has your Rules Committee left to it, if any Member at any time can move to amend the rules so as to bring in a particular bill or a particular subject and can move his rule without a report from that committee? Remember that this motion to amend the rules has not been referred to the Rules Committee.

The Constitution provides for rules. "Each House may determine"—determine, set metes and bounds, and fix the marks so that they can not be changed without care—"the rules of its proceedings." Now, the first business of the House is to see that its rules shall be so fixed as to enable it to do business; and because special persons in the House, or special interests, may from time to time desire that some bill shall be advanced, the rules have taken from every single Member the right to change the rules in special cases, and have provided a Rules Committee, and it is provided by the rules (XI, 53) that "all proposed action touching the rules, the joint rules, and order of business shall be referred to the Committee on Rules." We have spent about five hours to-day on a motion by a single gentleman to amend the rules. He says he is supported by a majority. If he was supported by a minority, he could have held his place here just as well, as well at least as far as two roll calls were concerned.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Does not the gentleman believe——

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this debate on the point of order is for the purpose of informing the Speaker; and it can not enlighten the Speaker, because the Speaker is not in the chair and not even in the Chamber.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER. I am always glad to yield to interruptions, because it brings attention in this instance to a point of order which is more important than any resolution before the House.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Does not the gentleman believe that if the Speaker had been of the opinion that a majority of this House would have sustained his ruling that he would have decided this question three hours ago?

Mr. PARKER. No. I do not think you are asking a very important question.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I will put it in another way, if the gentleman will permit me, in order to make it important. Has the gentleman ever seen the present Speaker or any other Speaker, during his service, and his service and mine are about the same, permit unlimited debate for five hours upon a question whether or not the question presented is a question of privilege?

Mr. PARKER. I think I have seen that done before.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman permit me to answer that?

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I can answer that. In the Fifty-sixth Congress that question was debated for two days.

Mr. PARKER. My recollection is that there was a very long debate in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. What question was it?

Mr. TAWNEY. On the question whether or not a provision on the sundry civil bill was in order. It was debated for two days.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. What provision?

Mr. TAWNEY. In regard to mileage.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. When?

Mr. TAWNEY. In the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. But that was under the rules we are now operating under, which demonstrates how ineffectual the rules are to do business, and how necessary it is to make a change.

Mr. PARKER. I am suggesting to the gentleman what he can not answer——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I will try to answer.

Mr. PARKER. The question is this: Whether, under the new proposition of order that is made here, any Member can bring forward an amendment to the rules at any time, and if so, whether it is not possible for a minority to occupy the whole session, in spite of everybody, by proposed amendments to the rules?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The minority has occupied very little of the session.

Mr. PARKER. I ask whether it is not possible, and whether it is not probable, that the minority would do it? I will ask the leader of the minority [Mr. CLARK of Missouri] whether he would like that power put in the hands of any minority of the House if he should be the leader of a majority party?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. But the Speaker would, in a very short while, say that he was ready to rule, and, ordinarily, to-day he would have ruled long ago.

Mr. PARKER. I do not consider that the interruption is pertinent to my question. I have put a question which has not been answered. It is unanswerable. The adoption of this principle that any man at any time may bring forward as a matter of high constitutional privilege a motion to amend the rules, and have it determined in the House without reference to a committee and without action by a Rules Committee, not only destroys the use of the Rules Committee, not only destroys all its functions, but is an abdication by the House of the power to do business.

The rules of the House are intended to provide that certain business shall be brought before that House according to the will of the majority. It is impossible that the rules of the House or the Constitution of the United States should mean or intend that the whole business of the House may be stopped by successive motions by different men, with the incidental roll calls—no matter whether those men are in the minority or not—motions to amend those rules so as to let in one topic or another, whether it be conservation or whether it be this, that, or the other, I do not care what.

If a man chooses to consider it important enough to move to amend the rules, he can nullify any majority, as the majority has been nullified to-day, not only for four hours, but by successive motions for the two hundred and fifty hours that are all we have in a short session. There are 150 Members in the minority ready to bring forward such motions and have such roll calls.

No such system of anarchy and chaos can be allowed in any deliberative body. The question now before us on the point of order is immeasurably more important than any question as to who shall be our Committee on Rules; for if this precedent be established, and this debate is in order, the Committee on Rules is as absolutely without power to do business as is the House itself.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I want to ask the gentleman if the same situation as he prophesies will exist in this House as a result of this rule—that is, the ability of a few men to take up the time of the House—does not exist as a present condition in another Chamber? Is it not in the power of one man there to take up the time of that body?

Mr. PARKER. Yes; and they suffer somewhat from it. I can not discuss other chambers, but I can only say that if any and every man here had the power to take the whole time of this House, we would have to do all of our business by courtesy and unanimous consent.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What does the gentleman say, in his opinion, as to whether or not there is any constitutional privilege in the pending resolution?

Mr. PARKER. There is none.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Why?

Mr. PARKER. The power given to each House to determine the rules of its proceedings is a power to prevent single Members from coming forward from time to time and occupying the time of the House, either with propositions to change the rules, or any other proposition.

The power to determine the rules of its proceeding is exactly analogous to the powers given to Congress. Power is given to Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. On that subject no Member has a constitutional privilege; we refer it to the Committee on Ways and Means.

"To provide for the common defense." We do that by referring all bills on that subject to the Naval Committee and the Committee on Military Affairs.

"To borrow money on the credit of the United States." We refer all such questions to the Committee on Ways and Means.

"To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." No such measure comes before the House until it is reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

"To establish a uniform rule of naturalization." All bills on that subject go to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

"To coin money, to regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and to fix the standard of weights and measures." Everybody knows that such subjects go to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

"To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States." All such measures go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

"To establish post-offices and post-roads." Those measures go to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

"To promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited time to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." Those go to the Committee on Patents.

"To constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court;" to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Now, the power in Congress to do all these things does not give the right to any man to jump on the floor at any time and bring in a bill for consideration of Congress. If so, we would be swamped with a multitude of ill-considered bills. Any proposition to advance one measure over another goes to the Committee on Rules, and rightly so, and you expect to establish a Committee on Rules for that purpose. What power and what jurisdiction would the committee have if you are going to allow any Member to bring up a measure for the change of rules before that measure is referred to the Rules Committee?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER. With pleasure.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Is it not a fact that the present Rules Committee exists by virtue of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. PARKER. No; it exists under the rules of the House.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Is it not a fact that not only the present Rules Committee, but the rules of the House, look to the Constitution of the United States for their authority, for their organic authority?

Mr. PARKER. The rules of the House depend upon the power of the House to make the rules. I think, however, that the House would have the power to make rules of procedure, as essential to its existence.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Would not the gentleman admit that you look to the Constitution to get your authority to adopt the rules which govern the House?

Mr. PARKER. I look to the Constitution and also to the necessity for a deliberative body to have rules. I look to the Constitution and also to the power inherent in every deliberative body, or assembly, to make rules.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PARKER. Now will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to go on with my argument?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I wanted to put one more question.

Mr. PARKER. I was going to refer to the question of the census.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. PARKER. It is rather hard to be interrupted and to pursue the train of argument which I had in mind.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I thought the gentleman wanted to be interrupted.

Mr. PARKER. Yes; but instead of one question the gentleman gives me five. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I am thoroughly in accord with the precedents in reference to the census. The Constitution says, to put it briefly, in effect, that Congress every ten years shall provide for an enumeration of the inhabitants, in order to make an apportionment of the Representatives in Congress and for the purpose of laying direct taxes.

It is not "may," it is "shall." It says that they shall do that. I have doubted whether the amendment to a census bill, which went only to the birthplace of the people or the nationality and tongue of their parents, comes thoroughly within the enumeration, but it is determined that it does, and that it has privilege, but only after reference to and report by the Committee on the Census, and not, as now claimed, without such reference. I abide by the precedent. The bill has got to be perfected at this Congress so as to go into effect this year, and other business, according to the precedents, must give way in order that that may be done. The Constitution makes a definite order that a certain thing shall be done at a certain time. The Constitution does not say that the rules shall be changed on mere motion. It says, on the other hand, that they shall be determined and made termini or landmarks which bind every Member, and that determination is gone if we allow every Member, any Member, at any time to rise in his place and move for a change of the rules. Imagine the chaos that would result! Every man has his pet hobby. Imagine when every man with a hobby, whether of the majority or the minority, can rise in his place and move to change the rules so as to let that hobby come before the House—imagine the chaos!

That is what we call a "suspension of the rules." We provide that such suspension shall need a two-thirds vote and come up only on certain days. In the old times such motions were made by the consent of the Speaker and his recognition. At this session, because there was no unanimous consent or assent to his granting such recognition, he has wisely withheld any such permission—except, I think, in the statehood bill—during the whole session. Imagine the result if any Member could at any time rise and move that the rules be changed so that he might bring forward his pet measure.

Mr. JAMES. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not, in his judgment, after five and a half hours' debate on this question, the Speaker is ready to rule.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I imagine that what I have said has been of some advantage to gentlemen on the other side, as not one of them has put a single question directly to the point that I have brought up, which is, that if this point of order be not sustained, there is an abdication by the House of its power to do business, and necessarily so, and that any small minority, composing a fifth of the House, can at any time render that House unable to go ahead. I appeal to gentlemen, not as politicians——

Mr. JAMES. I would like the gentleman to answer the question.

Mr. PARKER. The gentleman will excuse me, but I am not going to answer that question, except as I have answered it. I have answered that the gentleman himself ought to have gained some profit from what I have said, because neither he nor any man has been able to deny what I state—that this point of order goes back, goes far back of all questions as to what our rules shall be, goes far back——

Several MEMBERS on the Democratic side. How far? [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKER. I wish to go on. I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. JAMES. Does the gentleman——

Mr. PARKER. I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. JAMES. Well, I object to the gentleman going further back than Noah's ark. I am willing for him to go that far. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKER. It goes far back of any mere question of policy for this House. It goes far beyond any question suggested here as to the power of any officer or committee in this House. It goes far beyond any question of the bearing of the Constitution on the rules. It goes to the very existence of this House as a legislative body, and I appeal to every patriot of every party to support the power of the House to do business and to determine, as it should be determined, that no change of rules can be attempted without a previous reference of that change to a properly constituted Committee on Rules. Any man who supports any other doctrine destroys the greatest legislative body in the world. [Applause.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House but a moment. I want to call the attention of the House to two or three facts, which I think are pertinent and ought to be considered now and will be considered during the next six months. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FASSETT] chided some Members of this body because, forsooth, they were going to vote with Members of the other side of this Chamber on this question. I desire to remind him of the fact that the rules of this House were adopted through an alliance by a majority of this House with a minority on the other side [applause] consisting of 23 men. Therefore we have the rules of this House as they exist to-day, not passed by the majority Members of this House, but by some of the Republicans of this House and some of the Democrats of this House.

Now, I want to call the attention of this House to another fact. Nobody denies that this House has the power, pursuant to its rights, to make the rules of this House. Will anybody say that when they have adopted the rules for this House at the beginning of a session that we have determined that those rules shall not be changed until the term of Congress is over? How did it happen, if that is true, that the Rules Committee brought in here last session a change and gave us calendar Wednesday? This was done because we had empowered them to perform that and other functions. Now, suppose that that instrumentality of this House failed to perform the duty that this House had imposed upon it, suppose that the Speaker of this House concluded that there should be nothing done except to serve his own personal will and so this House was outraged by that tyranny, do you mean to say that we would have to suffer that tyranny the whole two years before we could exercise the power that this House has? Have they exhausted their power? Is not a residue of power left in the House which they could exercise at any time during the two years? I think that the proposition that the House has exhausted its power to make or change the rules of this House is absurd.

Gentlemen talk about there being chaos here.

Now, the proposition before this House ought to go before the country precisely as it is. It is as simple as this:

If we should agree to-night that there should be a Committee on Rules of 15 members, of whom 9 are to be Republicans and 6 are to be Democrats, I will unite and meet with the Republicans of the House in a caucus and we will select our 9 members. The Democrats will meet in a caucus and they will select their 6 members. That is all there is to this proposition. I do not care what form it takes, but it is a simple, plain proposition of having a Rules Committee elected in the same proportion as that we have it to-day—9 Republicans to 6 Democrats. We now have 3 Republicans and 2 Democrats.

Now, would there be any chaos if the 9 members should take up any measure for consideration that may be included in the programme that the President approves? Will any Member on this side of the House have the hardihood to say we would have any more chaos when our 9 members discussed any proposition and passed upon it than we have now with 3? Would it not be just as simple a proposition and just as expeditious?

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Wait until I get through. Would it not be just as simple a proposition then as it is now, and would it not be more responsive to the will of the people of this country than we know it to be now?

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. FOWLER. In just a moment. Now, another proposition which has been presented by men apparently with a feeling of pride and approval and satisfaction is that these rules are a product of one hundred and fifty years——

Several VOICES. Oh, no.

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, yes; one man said one hundred and fifty years and another said one hundred and twenty years, and I will give them the advantage of the first fifty years for a running start. Supposing they have been here for one hundred and fifty years. The laws of Russia have been in use for a thousand years, but is that any reason why they should not be changed? Are we to stand still? Are we to have this House Russianized through the tyranny of the Speaker and the Rules Committee? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This is the question that should go to the country, and every Member of this House will be confronted with it in his district. Do not forget it.

Do not imagine that your vote to-night ends the whole matter. This matter of a change of the rules of this House with the purpose of making this House a representative body is a national question. Do not forget it. What is its essence? It is this, that the man who presides over this House should be absolutely free himself and absolutely divorced from all legislative relation to this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The power of the Speaker to make and unmake men, the power of the Speaker to ruin a man's political career and he himself control legislation makes this the most corrupt influence conceivable in American life. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Ideals have been discounted in this place since I have been here until there is hardly such a thing as political ideals left here. Ethical considerations are wiped out, men are confronted with the possibility, with the certainty, of condemnation and consignment to political death because, forsooth, they will not knuckle and cringe. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I challenge every man in this House to-night to plumb his vote with his honest opinion and with his conscience as a man and say whether I have not stated the truth. Individually you have felt these things. Do not tell me you have not. I have been here for fifteen years, and I have on occasions gone up against that influence, which is literally atmospheric, and I thank God that when I have felt that it was a duty to my country, I have had the courage to meet it, bravely knowing what the consequences would be—aye, must be. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to say to you that the reports that will go out over this country will carry with them no fine distinctions or differentials, but it will be simply whether we will reform the rules of this House and liberate it. The people will make no fine distinctions. They will simply ask you whether you are in favor of the reform of the rules of this House. You as individuals, almost man for man, if you can free yourselves absolutely and vote your honest judgments and respect your consciences, will vote to liberate this body. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Speaker, I am as much in favor of changing the rules of this House as any of the so-called insurgents. But I am very much opposed to the methods they employ to gain their ends. I regard it as very much more in line with our duty to our constituents to secure changes in the rules and all else we strive for as we did calendar Wednesday, through the Republican majority in Congress.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment the question before us to-night is, Will we support this effort of a small minority of the majority party to set aside the theory that the majority shall rule? The Democrats do not wish to change these rules. I am safe in making this statement, because when they came into power a few years ago they did not attempt to change them, and there is no indication that they would change them now if they should ever come into power again. Hence, I say, the minority party in this House does not desire to change the rules. The Democrats will, however, assist you to change them now or to do almost anything that will discredit and disrupt the Republican party and prevent that party from doing what the people of this country have sent us here to do in the way of legislation.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. You mean not doing what they have sent you here to do.

Mr. REEDER. The Democratic purpose is to destroy the majority's power to do things, and I believe that this is legitimate of them as a party. But I do insist that a minority of the majority party in pursuing this plan of helping the minority to discredit the majority and deprive them of an opportunity to do what the people have sent them here to do is not legitimate warfare.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Kansas is not addressing himself to the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is coming as near to it as any of the others.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can not rise when another gentleman has the floor.

Mr. REEDER. I have a great desire to do some good as I go through the world, and I want to now try to help these insurgents to a just conclusion as to value of our foundation principle, "the majority shall rule."

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REEDER. I call this method of joining forces with Democrats absolutely unfair to the people of this great Nation. They sent us here as a Republican majority to do certain things. This minority claims that they want a certain thing done—and I believe that it should be done—but these insurgents are taking a means to accomplish it that is contrary to the theory of a majority ruling. They came here pretending to be Republicans, and the people sent them here supposing they would act with the Republicans. They seem to think it proper to join hands with the enemies of republicanism, to strike down the grand old party of Lincoln, McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REEDER. I will not be interrupted at present.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. REEDER. I will not suffer an interruption at present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas declines to yield.

Mr. REEDER. Such action on the part of those who assume the name Republican is absolutely unfair to the people who sent them here on the supposition that they would try to build up that party and, at least, not stab it in the back.

They are also unfair in this, that the people of this Nation sent Republicans here to legislate. A small minority say they want a certain thing accomplished. I, among others, think it should be done. Whether it is good legislation or not, I will not now discuss. It may be very advisable to make this change in the rules, but the method of doing so which is adopted by the insurgents is absolutely unfair and unjust to the people of this great Republic. The minority party does not want it. Hence, I insist that only a small minority of the majority party that do desire such a change in the rules have no sufficient reason to use foul means to accomplish their wish in this matter. They insist that they will rule the majority or they will ruin it—a very unfair process, a striking at the foundation principle of our Government; a very sacred principle to all patriotic people. I insist that they will hear from the patriotic people on their trampling this great American principle under their feet. The fact is, the Republican party is in the majority, and if there is a minority in that party who have convictions as to certain matters, they ought to go into the caucus and have the matter thrashed out there, and if they can not convince the majority they ought to then abide by the will of the majority.

That is my judgment as to what is right in such cases. Then if the Republicans in Congress do not do as the people think proper, at the next election the people will have their say; and I believe they will have a say as to the temerity of those who would thus ruthlessly trample this great principle in the dust. I know of no attempt to consummate their wishes in the ordinary way through their party organization. Such methods do not give the party an opportunity to do what they would do and what they are sent here to do. I would like to ask gentlemen before me, do you believe——

A MEMBER on the Democratic side. No.

Mr. REEDER. I do not believe that style of argument is any better than this attempted method of controlling the majority party. Let me ask you gentlemen, would you think it proper and just if a small minority, when they found that a large majority of their party were not in favor of a certain principle, should engage in a plan whereby the minority party would be brought into power for the purpose of discrediting that majority, and thereby much improving the minority party's chances to defeat the majority party at the polls?

Mr. GRONNA. Does the gentleman want an answer to that question?

Mr. REEDER. I do not yield at present. [Great laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GRONNA. I would be glad to accommodate the gentleman.

Mr. REEDER. I will accommodate the gentleman from North Dakota if he will wait until I get through with what I have to say. [Renewed laughter.] I want to emphasize, for the gentleman's benefit, what he and others are trying to do in this House to-day. A small minority wants to force the majority party of this House to proceed in a manner it does not regard as parliamentary. In other words, they would force the majority to do the will of said minority, and in such a manner as to discredit the majority.

Mr. GRONNA. The gentleman is in the minority now.

Mr. REEDER. I request the Chair to see that the gentleman does not interrupt me at present. [Laughter.] I will wait for order on the Democratic side. [Renewed laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order. Gentlemen will kindly preserve order.

Mr. REEDER. Now, the question would arise, What are the motives of this unseemly coalition? [Laughter.] That is an important question. Probably under the rules I had better not answer that question. [Renewed laughter.] Then, probably I could not answer it exactly to my taste, for lack of language. But the speeches of some of the leading insurgents have indicated something of the motives of at least a few in trying to have the minority of the majority party assume this rule or ruin programme in their attempt to change a rule of this House. These rules were much changed by the party in power. A calendar Wednesday became a part of the rules by a regular course of procedure of the party in power. This change of the rules has not been attempted by means of usual processes in such cases.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Now, will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. REEDER. Surely, I am safe in saying that there is no good reason to expect good to accrue to the party in power from such methods or a reasonable hope that by this process the wishes of the people in sending a Republican majority here to do the business of the people will thus be met. It can not be that any man will say that such an effort as is made here by a small minority of the dominant party to discredit and prevent that majority from doing business is wise, right, or according to the wish of those who sent us here. Such methods can not be in the interests of the people.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The people will pass upon that.

Mr. REEDER. The people, it has been suggested by my friend Mr. RUCKER, from Missouri, will pass upon it. Certainly, they will. It is equally certain they did not desire to send a majority to Congress to make our laws and have a small minority of that majority, that have some theory which they can not make the majority believe is wise, act with the minority party who have a different motive in view, and that that minority shall thus destroy the usefulness of the majority. If a minority bring about such a result, they will not only hear from the people but should hear from them in the interest of the principle "a majority shall rule."

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. REEDER. No; I will not permit any interruption at the present. When I get through, I will permit interruptions. I think that every rule of fair dealing—I wish to emphasize that fair dealing—demands that Members sent here by the votes of a party shall not betray that party into the hands of their enemies. But that they shall deal with their party on the majority-rule principle; that is, the minority of the Republicans are in duty bound to deal with the members of that party under the majority-rule principle.

The Republicans should run this Government for the two years for which they were elected; and the majority of the Republicans should determine what that policy shall be. In my judgment, the minority of that party should not take any unfair and unjust methods to set aside the will of the majority, because the people have determined they want that rule for these two years, and by our success or failure we are to be judged.

A MEMBER. That is right.

Mr. REEDER. Every move the Democrats help the insurgents to make which is contrary to the judgment of a majority of the Republicans of this House betrays the people's will that the Republicans shall rule during this term of Congress. I am inclined to think that the rules——

Mr. ELLERBE. The gentleman says he is inclined to think! That is a wonderful inclination. [Democratic laughter.]

Mr. REEDER. When you gentlemen get tired, I will proceed. The probability is that the rules ought to be changed in some respects. But the method that is here attempted to change them is certainly absolutely against the will of the people, who have decided that the Republican party come here to do the business for two years. I am talking against this method of yours, which is based on the theory that a small minority shall rule, or if not you will ruin; and if you are not doing that I do not know what this move you are assisting the Democrats to make means. Hence I say that while the rules need changing, the methods you use are inexcusable. The argument that the rules have been in force for a good many years and are the outgrowth of the tactics of both political parties is a good argument in favor of their being good rules.

It does not follow at all that because some rules and regulations which are bad and have stood for a thousand years in some foreign countries that these rules are necessarily bad because they are old and well tried. They have been held by both parties in this House to be good rules. That was a very absurd argument made by the gentleman just preceding me. The method attempted by a very small minority to control the majority against their judgment is the matter I feel it is important we inveigh against. I believe that it is a point that will be condemned by all good citizens. I do not believe there is an insurgent here to-day who believes that this is a square, fair, honest way of doing business. Now, if any of the gentlemen are anxious to ask me questions, I will endeavor to answer them.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman just stated that the rules ought to be changed in some respects. Will the gentleman give us his idea in what respects they should be changed, and give us the amendments he would make to the rules?

Mr. REEDER. If the gentleman from Kentucky will come around to my office in the forenoon to-morrow, I will tell him all about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAMES. Of course I am perfectly conscious of the fact that the gentleman could enlighten me, but I want all the House to participate in the wisdom of the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. REEDER. After I have informed the gentleman he can make a speech and give the House the information he has gained.

Mr. JAMES. It would be unfair to the House for the gentleman to enlighten me alone when he might enlighten the House and the whole country. The whole country is standing on tiptoe to-night to find out how the gentleman would change the rules, and how he thinks they ought to be amended. [Laughter.]

Mr. REEDER. I do not think that the gentleman from Kentucky thinks he needs information.

Mr. STANLEY. We want to have the gentleman tell us how he is inclined to think. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRONNA. The gentleman has stated that he does not believe that any of the insurgents believe that they are giving the House a square deal.

Mr. REEDER. I said I did not believe they considered they were giving their party a square deal.

Mr. GRONNA. I for one feel perfectly satisfied with the action that has been taken this afternoon, and I purpose to carry it out to the finish. Now, the question that I wish to ask the gentleman is this: Will he cite me to a single instance wherein a great reformation has been carried out by a majority?

Mr. REEDER. I will say this, that a small minority have no right when they are sent here to assist the majority in legislating in favor of the people to go into a coalition to destroy the power of that majority so that they can not control legislation.

Mr. GRONNA. Has the gentleman been sent here to legislate as a Republican, or has he been sent here as a legislator for the people?

Mr. REEDER. I apprehend I was sent here because I was supposed to be in favor of Republican principles and to legislate along the lines of the Republican party's established principles and policies. I am sure that anybody who knows me or has known me for any length of time would never send me here to legislate as a Democrat.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does the gentleman believe that a Representative on the floor of the House should faithfully carry out the will of his constituents?

Mr. REEDER. Yes; I believe he ought.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Then the gentleman has admitted that it is the duty of a Representative in Congress to faithfully carry out the will of his constituents. I agree with him, and I am glad to hear him make the statement. He has spent thirty minutes in criticising the minority of the majority side. If the minority of the majority has been sent here to amend the rules of the House, does he think he is justified in criticising them in the way he has?

Mr. REEDER. The majority is sent here for what purpose? To legislate under the principles of the Republican party, and not that a small minority shall say to the majority, "If we can not rule the majority, we will ruin it." I will suggest to the gentleman from Indiana, as well as the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], that the method we adopted to secure calendar Wednesday commends itself, to my judgment, as a proper method for changing our rules.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The gentleman will admit this to be true, that the Rules Committee is the all-powerful committee in the way of passing legislation?

Mr. REEDER. This rule that is proposed to be made is, as the gentleman knows, as powerful as the one we now have.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. REEDER. I did answer it, but probably the gentleman did not hear it on account of the confusion. I will answer it again. The rule that you Democrats are helping the insurgents to adopt——

Mr. COX of Indiana. Let me bring the gentleman back to the question. Does the gentleman admit that the Rules Committee is the all-powerful committee in the way of passing legislation in the House?

Mr. REEDER. The rule that the Democrats do not want, but are trying to help the insurgents by very questionable methods to force on the House, and hope thus to destroy the ability of the Republican party to fill its obligations to the people, has all the power that the present Rules Committee has, so there will be no change in that line. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will surrender the floor. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have been surprised at some of the statements made during this debate. I was surprised that my friend from Kansas [Mr. REEDER] should have been so much in earnest, not to say unanimous, in his characterization of the insurgents. He said that he thought they were not sincere. He fairly chided the insurgents.

Mr. REEDER. I want to say that I guess the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman means that I did not quote correctly what he said and "guesses" that way, he has, in the language of the street, another guess coming to him. [Laughter.] That is exactly what he did say; but, of course, I pass it by, because the gentleman was overcome—by the heat, I suppose. [Laughter.]

I treated what he said with the utmost respect. I smiled only once during his remarks, and that was when he said he was "inclined to think." [Laughter.]

I did not do that out of any feeling of disrespect, because I admire his masterful ability, but I smiled because he said he was inclined to think. [Laughter.] Up to that time I had not observed any indication of it. [Renewed laughter.] Afterwards he became thoroughly thoughtful, and I correspondingly serious, not to say solemn.

The gentleman appealed to party spirit. Party! Party! Party! That has been the shibboleth, that has been the club, to use the more common word, by which some of the gentlemen who have run the machine here since I have had the honor to represent the first district of Wisconsin have tried to browbeat men into following their wishes. I have seen the most trivial question immediately made a party issue, and when a Member dared to vote what he thought was right, have seen them look around askance as if a man had no right to think for himself, or even to be inclined to think, like the gentleman from Kansas. [Laughter.]

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Oh, I prefer that the gentleman wait. The gentleman will have more leisure and a better opportunity to get his thinker to running if he sits down. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, in discussing the rules of the House of Representatives which are to govern us in our deliberations as national legislators, it is not right—and I say it with entire respect for those who differ with me—it is not right to attempt to arouse the spirit of party. When I see men upon an issue of this kind seek to arouse one of the fiercest of human passions, there comes to me the words of Hallam in his Middle Ages—let us forget, let us forget "that prejudice about party names which makes up the politics of vulgar minds."

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FASSETT] made a very fine speech. I thought it was the speech which he intended to deliver when the gentleman from Ohio, General KEIFER, was to start the general debate on the pension bill [laughter]; but opportunity is a great thing, and it is a great thing for a man to be ready to seize it. The gentleman from New York also had a good deal to say about party, party, party, as if anyone who undertook rationally and candidly to discuss this question of the reformation of the rules of the House of Representatives was, for some reason, to be branded as a traitor to his party. I became a Republican about as long ago as I can remember.

I began to hurrah for Abraham Lincoln when I was a very small boy. I did it because I thought he was on the right side, and because practically all—not all, I want to say to my good friends across the aisle—practically all of the respectable people of my acquaintance were doing the same thing. From that time on I have been a Republican, and for sixteen consecutive years have been sent from the banner Republican district of the State of Wisconsin to represent that constituency on the floor of this Chamber. [Applause.]

The gentleman from New York, quoting from a letter written by that great patriot Theodore Roosevelt, said that there had been some splendid laws passed during his administration and spoke as if these rules and the Speaker were responsible for them. It is true that some splendid laws were passed. But with the Speaker in the chair and Theodore Roosevelt out of the White House, we would not have had those laws. The Republicans on this side voted for them. Of course they did, and so did the Democrats on that side. Be fair, gentlemen. You all voted for the rate law; you all voted for the pure-food law. You were patriots when it came to those great measures, and you voted to serve your country.

Were these Republican laws? In one sense of the word they were, because they were suggested and urged by a Republican President and enacted under a Republican administration, but it is none the less true that they received the practically unanimous support of the Democrats of this House. I say this because no man is so big a Republican that he can afford to be unfair on the floor of this Chamber in talking about a proposition to reform the rules which govern us.

Years ago I saw the real character of these rules; and the fact that they had received the approval of men so famous as Thomas B. Reed or John G. Carlisle, or the approval of anybody else, did not bind my judgment. I know, because of my experience here, that the rules centered in the Speaker more power than ought to be given in a republic to any man. They give more power to the Speaker of the House of Representatives than is possessed by the presiding officer of any other great parliamentary body in the world.

Ostrogorski, the Russian who came here from where they have a despotism, expressed his well-nigh indescribable surprise that in the first Republic of all history there should be centered in the Speaker of the House of Representatives the power to appoint all of the committees of the House, the power to appoint all of the chairmen of these committees, the sole power of recognition, and, in addition to all this, the power himself to preside as chairman of the most powerful committee in the House—the Committee on Rules. Nowhere else in the world, gentlemen, in a country that pretends to be civilized and free, has the presiding officer of its chief parliamentary body any power comparable to that wielded by the presiding officer in this forum of the people, the people's chamber, the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States. And because, after years of experience, some of us think that these rules ought to be amended in the interest of pure legislation, in the interest of all of the people, in the interest of the individual Representative, are we to be driven out of the Republican party?

I do not speak of these things because I have the slightest personal feeling against the Speaker of the House. I have always treated him with the utmost respect. Possibly if I were more quick tempered than I am and did not consider the question involved very much broader than the personal feelings or fortunes of any man I might be inclined to indulge in vituperation or something of that sort, but I shall refrain. Gentlemen will recall that the Speaker came down on the floor a little less than a year ago, while the tariff debate was on, stood here within a few feet of me, and, although I had not said a word concerning him, branded me a demagogue. Why? Why? Simply because I did not agree with him that there ought to be a high tariff on Standard oil. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] And to-day on the floor of the House of Representatives he spoke of this House consisting of Republicans, Democrats, and Populists. One gentleman touched me on the shoulder and said: "COOPER, that is you;" and a half dozen more—my friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG]—applauds that. Perhaps that suits his idea of the situation.

Mr. RODENBERG. A proper characterization.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, the Speaker voted against the resumption act, and every Populist in the United States voted against the resumption act. Was the Speaker a Populist? [Applause on the Democratic side.] I did not observe the gentleman from Illinois applaud. He is still smiling, but not applauding. [Laughter.] I do not call the Speaker a Populist—he thought he was right—nor do I question his motives, although my own have been questioned here to-day. But he voted to pass the greenback inflation law over the President's veto, and he voted also for free silver. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] But I am not going to call him a Populist. I long ago got above the childish habit of calling names. I am not going to use any bad names about anybody. Why? Because I was bred in a school of politics which taught that any man anywhere in this Republic had a right to his honest opinion and a right to be heard when he wished to express it. [Applause.]

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be impolite, but I must crave the protection of the Chair. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that I have been called a Populist, although, as I say, my Republicanism dates back to Abraham Lincoln, I beg permission to mention another circumstance. My relatives in Walworth County, Wis., kept one of the stations of the underground railroad. Does any man on this floor presume to claim that his Republicanism comes from a purer origin? Glover, the famous fugitive slave, was for three days and nights concealed in a garret of one of my relatives in that county.

But I am not so illogical as to say that because of these things, or because Abraham Lincoln freed the slaves and Grant fought great battles and received the surrender of his heroic adversary under the tree at Appomattox, that therefore the Speaker ought to have the power to appoint all the committees of the House. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] The rules of logic forbid my approval of any syllogism of that character. Because in other days the Republican party did heroic, noble deeds when great moral issues were before the electorate of the Nation, am I precluded from criticising the rules of the House of Representatives because some of the managers of the machine of this House say I must not criticise them?

Mr. Speaker, a very distinguished parliamentarian, one of the greatest parliamentarians in the world, a noble-hearted man, said to a Member of this House, who told me, "The House of Representatives surrendered its power when it surrendered to the Speaker the power to appoint the committees." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GAINES. When was that?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, the date is immaterial; but it took place.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if it did not take place in the early history of this Republic, and if the Republican party of to-day is to be censured, in his opinion as a Republican, because they have not found a better or a different way than that which recommended itself to the great names in the history of the country and the history of all its parties?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am not censuring the Republican party; I am not censuring the Democratic party. I am not criticising him who differs with me in opinion. I am simply claiming the right of a man having a constituency of 200,000 people—as good people as there are in America—to voice their sentiments and my own, under my oath to support the Constitution, and to do what I think is best for the country. That is all I claim for myself, and that is all anybody else ought to claim.

In reply to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES] I will at this point remind him of the fact that these gigantic abuses have become apparent within only comparatively recent years. It is only recently that the tremendous influences dominated by the financial magnates have become so important in the affairs of this Nation—within only a very few years. Why, I remember, and it occurs to me just at this moment, to have read a speech of Daniel Webster, delivered in about the year 1840, in which he said:

In the State of Massachusetts to-day there is not, in my judgment, one man who has his coach-and-four.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Up to the days of 1861 we did not have a millionaire in the South.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The age of the multimillionaires, practically billionaires in their power to control wealth, is only a very recent age. First, it was individuals, then partnerships, then corporations, then the gathering together, in one tremendous body, of many corporations.

To-day they send $10,000,000 from the city of New York to London, Paris, or St. Petersburg on the wings of the lightning in less time than one could send $10 from here to Baltimore, 40 miles, when the "great names" of which the gentleman from West Virginia speaks were on this earth. There is here a power to concentrate wealth that was undreamed of by them. There is here a power over the voters of the country and over the legislatures of the country which they never imagined. This is a new age. The world has all been made over since they were on the earth.

I revere their memory, but I am not always bound by what they said. The gentleman, or some other speaker, called them the "fathers." There is no greater fallacy in argument than to say that a man 40 years old—some of them who framed the Constitution and some who debated the early rules of the House were not over 35 years old—is one of the "fathers," so far as being able to instruct us in our duties as legislators to-day upon the issues which confront us. The fallacy consists in this.

If they were abler in their generation and possessed of more experience than the men who lived with them, then they had a right to instruct their contemporaries. But we have had one hundred and twenty years of history and of experience and a multitude after multitude of facts of which they were utterly ignorant. Are they, in any proper sense of the word, "fathers," so far as being able to teach us as to our duties at this hour, when there are conditions of which they never dreamed, problems of which they never heard?

Here is the railroad, the telegraph, the ocean cable, the steamboat, ten thousand things of which they knew nothing, by which wealth and power are concentrated. Are we to talk of them as the "fathers," and if we can find anything they said on the subject of the rules, obey it and do nothing? To me the suggestion has no force whatever.

But not only has the Speaker power to appoint men on committees, not only is he himself chairman of the Committee on Rules, but, gentlemen, he has the power to take people off of committees. [Laughter.] If any proof of that is necessary, I myself will make affidavit to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] yield to his colleague [Mr. NELSON]?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if it has not been the practice of this House from time immemorial that long service on committees entitled men to gradual promotions, and that seniority governed, and that if it is not true that the present Speaker has absolutely disregarded that old practice?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, that is true, I believe. I shall not indulge in epithets nor abuse of any sort, but I shall mention some facts which I think it is my duty to mention now. I would not refer to them if the gentleman from Wisconsin in his remarks in the early part of the evening had not spoken of my having been deposed from the Committee on Insular Affairs.

Well, that did not stop the wheels of government. It is not of vital importance. But inasmuch as the gentleman from Wisconsin has mentioned my removal from that important chairmanship, I wish to say just a word on the subject, begging the indulgence of the House, Mr. Speaker, for mentioning matters so purely personal. Never on the floor of the House have I referred to it, nor would I now do so but for this suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

After the close of the war with Spain there were presented to the people of the United States some problems of exceeding difficulty. One of them was involved in the answer to the question: What shall we do with our new insular possessions? When the House was about to organize after the treaty of Paris had been ratified, there was much of conversation among Members of the House—my friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the Democratic leader, will remember it—about a certain new committee which it was proposed to create and to have deal exclusively with the problems arising out of our possession of these islands.

I had no thought of being appointed on that committee. The subject was one that I had not discussed with anybody whomsoever. I was walking in the corridor yonder, back of the Speaker's chair, when Speaker Henderson came up, took me by the arm, turned me about, and said, "COOPER, I wish you would go into my room with me; I want to talk with you a moment." I went into the room with him. He said: "We are about to organize a new committee, to be called the Committee on Insular Affairs, and its personnel has given me a good deal of thought. It is very important, and I have consulted with the President about it. I have just about decided—in fact, I have decided—to appoint you chairman."

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Did he say that that was the second decision that he had made on the chairman?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He did not say it was the second; I take it that it was his first decision.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman who proposed the committee?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, I regret if I have wounded the feelings of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. Not at all; I simply wanted to give the history correctly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have been giving the history correctly, so far as I was concerned. I had not been told by the Speaker.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not question the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If there had been a decision to appoint the gentleman from Minnesota chairman, and that was reversed by a full court, I am not to blame. [Laughter and applause.] I did not know that, as the Yankees say, the gentleman was after the job. I am sure I was not. I had nothing—not the slightest thing in the world—to do with the decision finally made.

The Speaker took me into his room and we had the conversation which I have just detailed. He said: "I have decided to appoint you chairman." I thanked him and said, "Mr. Speaker, this is an exceeding great compliment to me." He continued: "Well, I have been talking with the President about it. The President told me that he did not wish to interfere and would not interfere at all, but I went over the subject with him, and he said, 'I would be very much pleased if you could make Mr. Cooper chairman.'" "Well," I remarked, "Mr. Speaker, I do not expect ever to receive a greater compliment than that."

Gentlemen will recall that on the committee was the present Speaker of the House, then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON. He was my right-hand man. [Laughter.] On that committee was also the very distinguished gentleman who now so ably represents the House and the country as the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from New York, Mr. PAYNE. On the committee was Mr. Hepburn—Col. Peter Hepburn, of Iowa—chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; Mr. LOUD, of California, chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; the gentleman from Indiana, Judge CRUMPACKER; the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. TAWNEY; Mr. Hitt, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs; Mr. Moody, now Mr. Justice Moody, of the Supreme Court of the United States; the gentleman from Mississippi, John Sharp Williams, afterwards the Democratic floor leader; the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. JONES; Mr. Maddox, of Georgia; Mr. Sibley, of Pennsylvania, and, a little later, Mr. Carmack, one of the most brilliant men I ever met, afterwards killed in Tennessee. Speaker Henderson went over the names of the committee, after saying that he intended to appoint me chairman, and I remarked, "Mr. Speaker, I hope you have considered this well." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Shortly afterwards I went to the White House to talk with President McKinley about the islands and the coming work of the committee. After the customary greeting, I informed the President that I had been appointed chairman of the new Committee on Insular Affairs.

He said, "Yes; I know; I have heard of that, Mr. COOPER. I talked with the Speaker on the subject; said to him that I did not wish to interfere at all and would not attempt to influence his decision in any way; but we talked it all over, and I told him I would be glad if you were appointed chairman of that committee."

I took him by the hand and said, "Mr. President, if I were to live a thousand years I should never expect to receive another such compliment."

He replied, "Don't speak of it in that way, Mr. COOPER."

I then asked this question: "Mr. President, have you now any suggestions to make as to the legislation which should be enacted for the islands? The problems are new, wholly new, and will prove, I doubt not, exceedingly difficult to the membership of the House."

At first he answered "No; I do not think, Mr. COOPER, that I have anything to suggest just at this moment," but as I turned away he reached up and taking me by the hand said, "One moment, Mr. COOPER. I think there is just one suggestion that I wish to make now. I hope that there will be no exploitation of any of the islands."

And while I was chairman of that committee there was no exploitation of any of the islands. [Applause.]

I was appointed to the chairmanship of the committee under those circumstances. I was deposed by the present Speaker under circumstances still fresh in the memory of all the Members present.

If my motives in attacking the rules had not been sincere, would I have attacked them? I had what ordinarily is called "a good thing" in this House. I had two rooms and a clerk, and I could look as wise as the average chairman does. [Laughter.] Then what earthly reason was there for me to attack the rules of the House of Representatives unless I was sincere in my belief that they ought to be changed? Why should I offer any criticism of the rules two or three years ago when I arose immediately after the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] had, in accordance with the action of the caucus, moved their adoption? Why should I arise here, as I did, and say substantially, "Mr. Speaker, in my judgment the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Williams] is correct?"

"These rules give to the Speaker of the House of Representatives more power than ought ever to be lodged in the hands of any man in a government that pretends to be republican in form and democratic in spirit." I said that then and I say it now. I knew the possible penalty. I said only what I believed then, and when I repeat it I say only what I believe now, for it was and is the truth. [Applause.]

The gentleman who is now Speaker is a man of much ability, of great force of character, and of iron will. He is a man disposed to have his own way; and every strong man is the same kind of a man. Nobody blames him for being endowed with the faculties which God gave him. But he ought not to have the power to do what is done under these rules. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] voted for him for Speaker, and yet he put him off of the chairmanship. Why? Because the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] had been in season and out of season trying to amend these rules.

Mr. CANNON. Now, will the gentleman allow me just a sentence?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I know what the Speaker will say——

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman from Massachusetts is here——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit me one word?

Mr. CANNON. I would like the gentleman from Massachusetts to tell the truth.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand it was just in this way: The Speaker had an interview with the gentleman from Massachusetts as to keeping the gentleman from Massachusetts on the committee, and the gentleman from Massachusetts said, "What will you do with the rest of them?" I was told by what I considered reputable authority that the Speaker said, "I am going to remove them; depose them," and then Mr. GARDNER said, "I will go with them," or something to that effect.

Mr. CANNON (to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], who had just come in). The gentleman from Wisconsin has just stated that you were put off the committee as chairman of the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions because of your position touching the amendment to the rules. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts be kind enough to state the fact?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I will state for the benefit of the House the exact situation with regard to my position as chairman of the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions. Some little time before the last Congress adjourned I was asked by a friend of mine in this House what my future position with regard to insurgency would be, and I was told that many of the Members on the Republican side had no objection to me personally, but did not want to see me removed from that committee, from the chairmanship. To that I answered if I retained that chairmanship I would be in an exceedingly false position.

Next I was spoken to by some one else, not a member of this House, and was told that I could retain the chairmanship of the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions if I chose to do so, and that there would be no obligation on me to refrain from insurgency in the future. Whereupon I went to the Speaker of the House and inquired what was likely to be the fate of the other members of the insurgent body who were chairmen. I explained to the Speaker that if he left me as chairman of the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions, that then, whether I wished to or not, in the future I should have to continue to be an insurgent on all matters in order to prove my good faith to the insurgent body, and I said to him, "Mr. Speaker, under those circumstances I should prefer not to be chairman of the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions." Is that correct?

Mr. CANNON. That is correct. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] voted for the Speaker, and was deposed from the chairmanship of the Committee on Banking and Currency. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], if he is here—will the gentleman state how far he was up on the committee of which he was a member at that time?

Mr. NORRIS. I was on several committees.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. On the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, what was your number?

Mr. NORRIS. I can not tell the gentleman offhand.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman was on the Committee on Elections.

Mr. NORRIS. There was no one ahead of me on the Committee on Elections except the chairman of that committee, and also on the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the gentleman's position to-day?

Mr. NORRIS. I am not on the committee.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. On the committee of which the gentleman is a member, what is his position compared with his position a year ago?

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the gentleman that I am not on any committee that has anything to do with legislation. [Laughter.] Perhaps that is not strictly correct, because I am on the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, which occasionally has something to do in that line.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What committees was the gentleman on in the last Congress?

Mr. NORRIS. Public Buildings and Grounds, Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did the gentleman desire to remain on the committee?

Mr. NORRIS. I did, but I made no request.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And the gentleman was removed from that committee?

Mr. NORRIS. I was.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] if he voted for the Speaker?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Was the gentleman in the last Congress chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. FOWLER. That is my recollection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is it the gentleman's recollection that he is now? [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. I am not a member of the committee now.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Not a member of the committee at all?

Mr. FOWLER. No.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I would like to question the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]. I would ask the gentleman from Kansas what his rank was in the last Congress, or would have been in this Congress, if he had been allowed to ascend in a normal way?

Mr. MURDOCK. I held a single committee assignment in the House, and that was on the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. Had I held my rank, I would have been, in this Congress, fourth or fifth on that committee.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did the gentleman hold his rank?

Mr. MURDOCK. I did not.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Where is the gentleman now?

Mr. MURDOCK. I moved steadily downward until I am now tenth or eleventh. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One moment. How long has the gentleman been a member of that committee?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have been a member of that committee since the Fifty-eighth Congress.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Has the gentleman ever had any trouble with any member of the committee personally? [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman mean in the way of physical violence? [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; I mean does the gentleman know of any reason why he should not have been allowed to climb up instead of being thrown down?

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, I think, undoubtedly, that I was demoted on that committee from the fifth or sixth place to the tenth or eleventh place because I did not subject my will at all times to the chairman of that committee and to the Speaker of the House.

Mr. CANNON. May I say a word right there?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would prefer, unless the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the present Speaker, desires otherwise, not to be interrupted. Of course I would yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to make a statement, and I would like just a minute in which to make it. The appointment of the committees is made by the Speaker under the rules, unless the House should otherwise specially order. The Speaker of the House in the exercise of that function is responsible to the House and to the country, this being a government through parties, and the Republican party has placed power in the Speaker as to the appointment of committees. I will not enter upon the personal equation touching the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], or the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] will recollect that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] was chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency when the emergency currency bill was pending in that committee. The only way to consider that bill in the House was to have that committee make a favorable or an unfavorable report upon it.

The gentleman will further recall that the Republican side of the House held two caucuses, and the caucus by a large majority expressed its wish that the Committee on Banking and Currency should report that bill with or without favorable recommendation, so as to enable the House to work its will upon it by a majority. That committee, under the leadership of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER], a Republican chairman, refused to respect the will of the Republican caucus. That made a foundation upon which the Speaker of the House could recognize a Member to move to suspend the rules and discharge the committee from the consideration of the bill and thus bring it before the House, which was done, and a majority of the House did work its will upon that bill.

Subsequently the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] failed to enter and abide by a Republican caucus, and this being a Government through parties, for that, as well as for other sufficient reasons, the Speaker of the House, responsible to the House and to the country, made the appointments with respect to these gentlemen as he conceived it to be his duty in the execution of the trust reposed in him. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who has just made the statement——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I could hardly understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], but I am told that he said that the gentleman from Nebraska—and I presume he referred to me, since my name was mentioned by the gentleman from Wisconsin—had refused to abide by a Republican caucus.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He did.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. He said the gentleman refused to enter and abide.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like, if the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit, to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question as to whether he refers to the caucus over the so-called currency bill.

Mr. CANNON. Not that. I spoke of the Republican caucus, so far as the gentleman from Nebraska is concerned, which was held just before the organization of the House.

Mr. NORRIS. At this Congress?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the gentleman from Illinois aware that I voted for the nominee of that caucus for Speaker?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; but the caucus took other action.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. CANNON. Where the gentleman did not abide by the action of the caucus.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman, I suppose, refers to the rules?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, if the gentleman will yield further, I wish to ask another question of the Speaker.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The issue just presented by the Speaker is this: If, in the House, a Member votes against rules adopted by the caucus his political destiny is in the hands of the Speaker. He can be punished by the Speaker for voting against rules adopted by a caucus, although our party has never declared in favor of any set of rules. The House rules have not entered into our party creed, and yet he arrogates to himself the right to say, and has just announced, that gentlemen must follow the caucus on the rules or he can punish them, discredit them in the eyes of their constituents, lessen their influence on this floor, coerce them into doing his will. Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I was going to suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that it might be well, while he and the Speaker are asking questions back and forth, to inquire whether it is not true that not only the Republicans who refused to vote for the old rules of the House were punished, but that on the Democratic side of the House those who joined with the Republicans and voted to adopt the old rules were rewarded for going back on the Democratic party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois voted against the tariff bill for no reason except that he did not like one schedule, and yet he was given one of the most important chairmanships in the House.

Mr. LANGLEY. Who is that?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. MANN of Illinois.

At the opening of the last session of Congress we were about to take up a tariff bill. No committees except the Committee on Ways and Means had been appointed.

The Constitution of the United States gives to the House of Representatives the sole power to inaugurate tariff legislation. The House is by the Constitution made of first importance when it comes to providing revenues for the Government; and yet this great body before it could begin to consider the tariff bill was confronted by a rule. And what a rule! My countryman, what a rule! Hundreds of pages in the bill, thousands of items—more than 4,000 items—relating to all of the industries of the country. But what was the rule? Remember that the committees had not been appointed. A rule was brought in limiting this House, so far as making amendments was concerned, to only lumber, hides, tea, coffee, barley, barley malt, and one more. We could put any or all of these I have named on the free list—tea and coffee were already on the free list—or we could put a tariff on them in our discretion.

But what as to the other item named in the rule? Listen to this: In that rule presented to the House of Representatives, when about to begin the consideration of a great tariff bill for which it was primarily responsible, were these six items, and only one more. What was that one? Standard Oil. But under that rule the House could not vote as it pleased on oil. The only thing that we could do with oil under that rule was to give it a tariff of 25 per cent or leave the Dingley countervailing tariff of 70 per cent or more. What do gentlemen think of that as a rule coming from the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives? At the present session the House has taken time to consider bills, among them the splendid agricultural bill presented by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT], and the other appropriation bills, and has spent days in going through them section by section, with the right of every Member of the House to offer amendments. But a year ago, when it came to the tariff bill, we were not allowed to do this; but we finally succeeded, gentlemen will remember, in getting an opportunity to vote for free oil, although only after the hardest kind of a parliamentary fight.

Will you tell me why, after the brief of the counsel for the Government of the United States had been filed in the United States circuit court of St. Louis against the Standard Oil Company—it was on file when we were called to vote on that rule—declaring that great corporation to be practically without a real competitor; that the independence of the so-called independent companies was largely pure sham; that the Standard Oil Company said where these might do business and how they might do business, so far as the great majority of them were concerned—will you tell me why a rule was brought in permitting the House to vote as it pleased on barley and barley malt, and tea, and coffee, and lumber, and hides, but not to vote as it pleased on oil?

I voted against that rule, but the House adopted it. Then came the question of the passage of the bill, and we passed it. And after the bill was passed no committees were appointed. Mark this, gentlemen; I want gentlemen to say whether there is here a power that ought to be taken away from somebody.

I do not say this out of any disrespect for the Speaker nor for any other Member of the House, but I speak as a Representative trying to discharge his duty to his constituency and his country when I call attention to these facts. As I said, no committees were appointed after we passed the tariff bill, and the Speaker still held that power to raise or to lower a Member in the scale of dignity on any committee. What happened? The urgent deficiency bill was brought up, and in the bill had been put a provision appropriating $6,000 for an automobile and a chauffeur for the Speaker as a matter of urgent deficiency. [Laughter.] Why, every other year the Speaker is not here from March until December. Do that automobile and the chauffeur, from March to December, help to discharge the duties of the Speakership? Not at all. But that appropriation for the automobile and chauffeur came before the House of Representatives last summer before the committees had been appointed, and it went through and became part of the law. Long after the committees were appointed and after the House knew what was going to be done, and only a few days ago, there came up a proposition to appropriate money to pay the chauffeur and the House refused to vote it.

I do not speak of this as of very great importance, except as it shows that here somewhere is a coercive power which ought to be done away with. One of the prominent gentlemen of this House, a Republican, who voted for the bill, and voted to keep that amendment in it, said to me that, standing as a naked proposition by itself and not in the urgent deficiency bill, the appropriation ought not to pass. But Members of the House did not like to displease the Speaker; and it is only human nature that they should not wish to displease him.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin permit an interruption?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. Did the House, or the Committee on Appropriations, in the first instance, propose or recommend an appropriation for the purchase of an automobile for the Speaker of the House?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It came in here in some way in this urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. It came in here as an amendment of the Senate, and the House, by a majority vote, kept it in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One moment. I remember very well to have seen the Speaker standing in that lobby door, with an unlighted cigar, during that roll call on the motion to recommit with instructions, and immediately after the roll was called I saw the gentleman from Minnesota, who had made an elaborate speech in defense of the automobile as an urgent deficiency, go to the Speaker, and the Speaker put his arm on his shoulder and smiled, because the amendment had been retained. I said not a word about it, but thought it most remarkable. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption again?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is the gentleman aware of the fact, and he is aware of the fact, for he was on the floor at the time, that I had really stated upon the floor, at the request of the Speaker, that he did not ask for the automobile, nor did he want it. I speak the fact, and the gentleman knows it as well as I do; and therefore his inference, or the inference that he wishes the House to draw from the situation which he relates, which I know nothing about, and do not recall, I therefore do not believe was justified. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have told the absolute truth of what took place. It struck me as one of the most extraordinary things I had ever seen in the House of Representatives. Flushed with victory, after having passed the tariff bill, the gentleman from Minnesota earnestly defended an appropriation in the urgent deficiency bill for an automobile and a chauffeur for the Speaker.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him again? The urgent deficiency bill passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Before the tariff bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand that, too—the original bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. That was not your statement.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; you are mistaken.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, I know it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am speaking of the urgent deficiency bill after it came back from the Senate. At that time none of the committees had been appointed. If the gentleman said that the Speaker did not want the appropriation it was a most gracious thing to say; yet any Member who voted for it felt that he was doing a kindly act toward the Speaker, and anyone who voted against it felt that he was doing something that would displease him. One could not help thinking so, in view of what he saw here on the floor.

Now, the gentleman from Minnesota has repeatedly urged, in season and out of season, economy in public expenditures. He has argued in season and out of season that we guard the public Treasury against improper expenditures. He has everywhere over the country demanded that nothing in the way of extravagance be permitted; yet because an amendment to the urgent deficiency bill came here appropriating $6,000 to buy an automobile, and hire a chauffeur, he defended it as a legitimate expenditure of the public funds.

We give to the President of the United States the use of an automobile. He lives here for four years. His family are here. We give members of the Cabinet the use of certain vehicles. Their homes are here for four years. Their families are here. The officials of the various departments are supposed to be here, or some one is here representing them during the whole year. They must go from department to department in vehicles. But how does any gentleman defend the purchase of an automobile and the payment of a chauffeur as being in any proper sense of the word necessary for the discharge of the duties of the Speakership?

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him? Pray tell me what official duty of the President calls for him having two automobiles in which he and his family simply take pleasure trips? I voted against that. I think the gentleman is right in what he is saying. He need make no apology. We ought not to have voted one for the President. However, I am not taking issue with the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I voted for that realizing that the President of the United States is the highest official in the world, and lives here, or is supposed to live here, four years. It is his home.

Mr. Speaker, I have only one word more to say, and that is concerning the alleged binding power of the caucus.

The Speaker in his remarks a few minutes ago criticised certain Republican Members because they did not obey the mandate of the caucus on the rules. I assert that no caucus has a right to bind a Member to vote for a set of rules, his party not having declared for them. Moreover, I deny here and now, that any number of men, say 51 out of 100 at a caucus—two more than a majority—or any other caucus majority, have authority under any circumstances to control my vote against my well-considered, honest judgment that rules adopted by a caucus would not be conducive to proper legislation nor to a proper administration of the affairs of the House of Representatives.

This statement suggests the reasons why Members refused to stand by what was done at a recent caucus in the matter of the appointment of a committee to investigate the Department of the Interior and the Bureau of Forestry. Permit me to tell the House why I refused, and I know that I was right in refusing, to sustain the action of the Republican caucus in trying to dictate who should be the Democratic Members of the committee of investigation. It can be told in few words.

The public lands of the United States are not the property of the Interior Department. They are not the property of the President. Nor do they belong to any political party. They are the property of all of the people of the United States, Republicans and Democrats and all other citizens. I have an equal undivided share in every foot of that unsold land, as has also each one of you Republican gentlemen. It was in part your property as it was in part mine that was to be involved in the investigation. In part also it was the property of the gentlemen across the aisle. Each Democrat here owned as great a share as did any one of us. It was the public land. What were we? We were part owners, but we were also trustees bound by our oaths and by every instinct of honor to protect the property and to protect the rights of the people in it. Charges had been made that some of it of great value was being improperly taken—charges that a conspiracy had been created to acquire it in violation of the law, and for a totally inadequate consideration. In other words, it was alleged that the interests of our cestuisque trust was in jeopardy, and that they would be defrauded of money which ought to go into the trust funds.

I was a trustee, and yet I was asked to go into a caucus on a question that might involve my good faith as a trustee, surrender my sense of duty into the keeping of the caucus, and do without question its bidding. And that I could not conscientiously consent to do. No man ought to ask me to do it. No man ought to ask himself to do it.

Republicans were asked to dictate by caucus just what Democrats were to help investigate charges that public lands—the common property of all the people—were being unlawfully and fraudulently bartered away. I could not agree that a Republican caucus should do this. It was not a question of party. It was not a question of politics. It was a question of investigating alleged wrongful acts respecting property belonging to all of the people, share and share alike.

The Democratic minority had a perfect right to select their quota of the investigators, and the Republican majority had a right to select theirs, and I could not see that I forfeited my rights as a Republican in refusing to consent that a Republican caucus should select them all. The Republicans who insisted that the Democrats ought to have a right to choose their own men were the friends of the Republican party in that caucus, and the best judgment of the Republicans of this House has since justified our refusal to abide by the caucus decision. I insisted that night that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], a Democrat, chosen by the Democratic caucus, ought to be retained, and I insisted also that the other Democrat ought also to be one chosen by the Democrats and confirmed by the Republicans; and that is what finally was done and what you had to do. [Applause.]

I was declared to be not a Republican for so insisting, and yet before the transaction was ended the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] was on the committee, and the Democrats in caucus selected as his associate the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], and the Republicans confirmed the selection. Who was wrong, and what was wise as a matter of party policy? I said then that to permit the Democrats to select their men and for us to confirm them if they were impartial men would, as a mere matter of policy, be much the better for Republicans from a party standpoint; and I say so now—vastly better from the standpoint of mere party.

That was one question on which the caucus had no right to bind the vote of a Representative.

Another such question is that of the rules. There are some subjects which have no business in a party caucus. I can not consent that a caucus shall absolutely bind my judgment and control my vote on the vastly important question of what rules shall govern the House of Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, until after I listened to certain of the remarks made here to-night I had no thought of participating in this debate, although I feel very deeply on the subject now before the House. Years ago I saw the undue power which the rules give to a Speaker, and often since then I have seen Members feel that power.

I know that the House must have a Speaker, must have rules, must be in some degree managed and controlled; but I know, also, that a Speaker ought not to be privileged in any manner nor to any degree to coerce a Member in the discharge of his official duties by having the power through his control over appointments to reward or to punish him.

Under the Constitution this is a House of equals, each entitled to act and to vote free from every form of coercion and wrongful influence, and responsible only to his constituency and his conscience.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for just a minute to correct a false impression made by the gentleman from Wisconsin as to what I said and who would not extend to me the courtesy of an opportunity to correct him. The gentleman, in his duty to his constituents and in his conscientious convictions, endeavored to leave a false impression as to what I have said. His argument was made against party loyalty. He thus entirely misleads as to my contention. Why this class of argument? He entirely ignored the question of methods. I had not condemned the desire to change the rules, but I criticised the methods used by the insurgents in their efforts to prevent the majority from accomplishing a duty the people have intrusted them with.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that we have now been in session since 12 o'clock this morning. The discussion has taken a wide range, in part confined to questions of order, and at the close it will be necessary for the Speaker to rule. On a question of this kind, in the opinion of the Chair, in justice to himself and to the House the ruling ought to be after a full presentation of the precedents. The Chair apprehends that an appeal will be taken and the House will either overrule or sustain the Speaker. On a question of this importance, in the opinion of the Chair, the House as well as the Speaker ought not to be wearied with a session that has already run almost twelve hours. The Chair would be glad indeed if the House in its wisdom should think proper either to adjourn or take a recess—an adjournment would be better.

Mr. TAWNEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I understood that I was recognized, but I will yield to the gentleman from Minnesota to make the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman next.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 137, nays 146, answered "present" 12, not voting 94, as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON] is recorded as voting.

The SPEAKER. He is not.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I voted "no." I desire to withdraw that vote and answer "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the name of the gentleman.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. GOLDFOGLE and he answered "present."

During the call of the roll the following occurred:

Mr. GAINES (interrupting the call). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to vacate the proceedings under this call and take a recess until 12 o'clock. [Cries of "Regular order."]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, and the Clerk will proceed with the call.

The Clerk announced the following additional pair:

For the vote:

Mr. SPERRY with Mr. LINDSAY.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House take a recess until 11.55—I will make it 11.30—to-morrow morning.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that that is a dilatory motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Minnesota that the House just having refused to vote to adjourn, which would have carried the proceedings over until 12 o'clock to-morrow, that now the motion to take a recess until 11.55, the point of order being made, would seem to the Chair, under the rules, to be dilatory.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, my motion is to take a recess until 11.30 to-morrow morning and continue the present legislative day. The legislative day is continued by way of that motion if it is carried. I submit that is not dilatory, and I have reason to believe that the motion will prevail.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the motion in good faith?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do.

The SPEAKER. And not as a dilatory motion?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not. As evidence of that I will say to the Chair that a number of gentlemen who voted against my motion to adjourn stated that if I had moved to take a recess they would have voted for the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair then will entertain the motion.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that the House do stand in recess until 11 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 141, nays 142, answered "present" 12, not voting 94, as follows:

So the motion to take a recess was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. AMES with Mr. CRAVENS.

For the balance of day:

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH with Mr. LATTA.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I think it is about time in the progress of this debate that we call attention to the question before the House. It is about time that we consider what the question is and it will be my wish at this late hour to speak with the utmost kindness of everybody who participates in this discussion and who votes here to-night on this question, but I may be, Mr. Speaker, allowed to say that for many hours I have listened to a discussion that had no relation at all to the question before the House. I have heard people advocate their claim to vote as they pleased as Republicans because they had become Republicans long ago in consequence of living in a good neighborhood or having members of their family that had something to do with a fugitive slave in a garret, but nothing else was said by them to warrant the claim that they had been faithful Republicans. Now, I have said that with the utmost kindness.

I do not complain of people voting as they please, for I have a very good record here and elsewhere in times gone by for voting exactly as I pleased upon great questions. But that is a question of party, and I must return now to what I said. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] undertook to show that he had a high constitutional question and it was one that gave it the privilege to be considered here now. He quoted from a paragraph of the Constitution of the United States which reads:

Each House may determine the rules of its procedure.

That was a very clever permissive thing put into the Constitution of the United States, but it was not essential to the House, and I agree with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, in saying that the right to make the rules would have been complete without it; that the right to make rules for the government of the House would have inhered in it without any provision in the Constitution on the subject.

But the gentleman from Nebraska stopped there, and I now want to call the attention of the House to one thing further. Assuming that the House has a complete perfect right under the Constitution of the United States to make rules, then it must be assumed that when the rules are made by a majority of this House that they are constitutional rules. The proposition now is that, having made rules according to the Constitution of the United States, then we may override those rules thus made by violating them, for that is exactly what is demanded of this House. Let us see about the rules. Did not we make them? I do not know whether the gentleman from Nebraska or the gentleman from Wisconsin or the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] voted for them or not, but it is quite immaterial to me when I know that a majority of this House did vote for them, and the gentleman from Nebraska says that we had a constitutional right to make them. Now, we did make them. What did we say? I read a paragraph from Rule XXI, thus constitutionally made, which provides:

Any petition or memorial or private bill excluded under this rule shall be returned to the Member from whom it was received; and petitions and private bills which have been inappropriately referred may, by the direction of the committee having direction of the same, be properly referred in the manner originally presented.

Now, turning to another paragraph, paragraph 3 of Rule XXI, it says:

All other bills, memorials, and resolutions may in like manner be delivered, indorsed with the names of Members introducing them, to the Speaker, to be by him referred, and the titles and references thereof, and of all bills, resolutions, and documents referred under the rules, shall be entered on the Journal, etc.

Now, turning to another paragraph we find that the Committee on Rules has jurisdiction of all resolutions and all motions to amend the rules, all resolutions or motions relating to the rules. Now, that rule we made by a majority vote of this House, and that was made, according to the gentleman's claim, under the Constitution of the United States, and it is in vogue now, and the gentleman therefore says we ought to violate it under the Constitution.

I quote paragraph 53 of Rule XI:

All proposed action touching the rules, joint rules, and order of business shall be referred to the Committee on Rules.

A MEMBER. Louder.

Mr. KEIFER. Some gentlemen will not be able to hear because of a deafness of mind, no matter how loud I may talk. [Applause and laughter.] Now, having said that much I might comment on the rule just read that gives to the Committee on Rules this jurisdiction, but it is well understood. The Committee on Rules has the least jurisdiction of any committee of the House for the purpose of shaping of any one of the principal committees of the House. It does not shape legislation at all. That committee acquires no jurisdiction over legislation in shaping the character of it.

The gentlemen on the other side are arraigning the rules, and they come here to-day attacking the only rule that has no operation or effect in relation to the character of business we may do. We may, through that committee, have special rules to entitle us to do business. Somebody said here that it was unusual to have a discussion upon a point of order raised with reference to the alteration of the rules.

I can give day and date when we did have discussion. I saw in this House more than fifty Members with the hilts of their pistols sticking out of their pockets while we discussed this very character of question for a whole day, and into the evening and the night, on the 29th day of May, 1882.

The Speaker then listened all day long, and we heard almost the rattle of the hilts of their pistols. Then the Democrats, if you will turn and read the RECORD of that date, were denying the right under the Constitution or the rules of the Republicans in that House to amend, and they were heard all day long. We were simply trying then in that House to amend the rules, to give to the majority of the House the right to consider election cases, always held to be of the highest privilege. It occurred in the Forty-seventh Congress. For the first time in the history of the country it was then sought by dilatory motions and otherwise to prevent the consideration of an election case which was essential to be decided before it could be a complete organization of the House.

The then Speaker ruled that dilatory motions, according to the general rules of parliamentary law, could not be made in that case, and they have been practically throttled and set aside from that day to this. Now we are reversing it. We are not denying that you may change the rules, but you must change them under the rules made according to the Constitution of the United States. Yesterday the gentlemen insisted that they had the right to say that rules that had been made by a majority of the House against their votes were so sacred that the Constitution could not override them.

Mr. NELSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON]?

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, yes.

Mr. NELSON. As a former Speaker of that House I would like to ask you a question.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to have it on the point of order.

Mr. NELSON. Is there any way of bringing up the matter of a change in the rules of this House without the consent of the Speaker and the Committee on Rules, except on the opening day of a Congress?

Mr. KEIFER. There is the same rule for bringing up that question that there is for other questions, and I meet the question by saying that we made these rules, and we made them by a majority of the House. Some of these gentlemen voted for them.

Mr. NELSON. Answer my question, please. He can not do it.

Mr. FOWLER. Did the House exhaust all its powers and exhaust them for two whole years on these rules when it adopted them?

Mr. KEIFER. Nobody ever dreamed that but you. Nobody ever talked it, I guess, but you.

Mr. FOWLER. Very well. Can you tell me how we can change them within the two years?

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, yes. The gentleman from New Jersey will pardon me when I say that I understand he helped to make these rules. Is that right? And I understand also that a few days ago he was a sort of a hermaphrodite on the subject of changing the rules. He wanted them about half and half; that is, to give the Speaker the power of appointing four and the House five of the members of the Committee on Rules. Is not that right? You do not deny it, do you?

Now, I think he has become converted to-day to something else, and we will soon see what that is when we get along a little further. If the gentleman wishes to deny that statement I will yield.

Mr. FOWLER. Deny which statement?

Mr. KEIFER. The statement that you had this notion of giving the Speaker part and the House part.

Mr. FOWLER. Not at all.

Mr. KEIFER. On the 25th day of January last you offered a resolution of that kind.

Mr. FOWLER. You are utterly wrong, absolutely wrong.

Mr. KEIFER. I hold here in my hand and will read it if necessary——

Mr. FOWLER. It is absolutely wrong.

Mr. KEIFER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have given the gentleman a chance to admit or deny what I have charged. I will, before I conclude, read his resolution. But the burden of complaint is that the House of Representatives ought to have a right to do business according to the majority; that the Representatives of the people who come here should be heard.

Mr. Speaker, until the proposition was submitted to-day to amend the rules—some of those rules—I have never understood that that proposition was denied. Indeed we put in the rules here a provision recognizing the right of the House to settle that question. But to-day there comes a resolution, advocated by gentlemen who are appealing to the country for the right to make rules and legislate as they please, advocating that doctrine and appealing to have their resolution adopted that absolutely excludes this House from appointing the Committee on Rules at all. I think it well to read it, and thus get back where I may show from the beginning how absurd the proposition is. I read:

Resolved, That the rules of the House be amended as follows:
The Committee on Rules shall consist of 15 members, 9 of whom shall be members of the majority party and 6 of whom shall be members of the minority party, to be selected as follows—

Not as the House would select them, but "as follows."

The States of the Union—

Mr. Speaker, I do not know what sort of history the man has who wrote that line. I did not know we had any other States now but States of the Union. Let me read it again:

The States of the Union shall likewise be divided by—shall be divided by a committee of three, elected by the House for that purpose.

I thought they did not want committees. Gentlemen want persons. But this rule requires three persons. Now, what is worse than all:

Elected by the House for that purpose.

I had better read that all again:

The States of the Union shall be divided, by a committee of three, elected by the House for that purpose, into nine groups, each group containing, as near as may be, an equal number of Members belonging to the majority party. The States of the Union shall likewise be divided into six groups, each group containing, as near as may be, an equal number of Members belonging to the minority party.

It may be impossible; I think it is, when it comes to practice. No matter:

At 10 o'clock a. m.—

Which we used to be told meant master of arts—

At 10 o'clock a. m. of the day following the adoption of the report of said committee—

I suppose it is that—each of said groups shall meet and select one of its members a member of the Committee on Rules.

Now, remember, one of the nine groups will select without the advice of the other groups a member of this to-be Committee on Rules. Persons belonging in other groups have nothing to say. Each one of the six groups will select a member—I suppose Democrats, unless they are in a majority, and then they would be on the other side.

Now there are five-sixths of the Democrats not allowed any hearing at all in selecting one of them, and so it goes on. And there are fourteen-fifteenths of the party in the majority that can not have anything to say in selecting any one member of the Committee on Rules. I want to work this out a little further, and find we have got a little committee of three that is to make groups, and the groups make a report to the House, and the House is not privileged under this resolution to reject it, or any part of it, but must proceed with the other groups, and then when the groups have all reported simply accept them as thus constituted. I had better read along further from the resolution:

Each of said groups shall meet and select one of its members a member of the Committee on Rules. The place of meeting for each of said groups shall be designated by the said committee of three in its report. Each of said groups shall report to the House the name of the Member selected for membership on the Committee on Rules.

When that report is made, as I have just said, the House has to be silent as the grave. It has no right to say aye or no. There may be the most objectionable man in the world on it, and nine-tenths or more of the House may be willing to vote down the whole committee, but under this rule, if adopted, the House must accept it forever for that Congress.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, yes.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that you advocate the majority rule?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I have understood, if my memory serves me correctly, that the Speaker also says that the majority can do business any time.

Mr. KEIFER. Under the rules of the House; yes.

Mr. DAVIS. Why, then, is it that you and others at this time object to the Members of this House coming to a vote upon the resolution now before it? Do you fear that the majority is against you, or what?

Mr. KEIFER. If you put your question right I will answer it. I will say that I have always advocated, and the rules that we now have require, the House to be controlled by a majority. Rule XXV and others of the House provide for this.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, do you object?

Mr. KEIFER. Well, now, the gentleman wants to know why I will not allow a new principle to be injected here without full debate, and I say it looks as if some of the men who may ask questions on this matter if there is debate may possibly be helped by it.

Mr. DAVIS. Then do you object to having a vote upon this resolution?

Mr. KEIFER. We are going to have a vote on it, and I hope we can have it intelligently.

Mr. DAVIS. How much more delay do you want to have before you vote on it?

Mr. KEIFER. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, if the question is put in the spirit I think it is, that the gentleman means to say that nine-tenths of the talk for the absurd proposition should come from the other side of the House and only about one-tenth from this.

Mr. DAVIS. I simply say this——

Mr. KEIFER. I think we will have a little more debate, and I hope we will understand the question, no matter whether we vote right or wrong.

Mr. DAVIS. If the gentleman continues, I do not doubt that we will have a better understanding.

Mr. KEIFER. I thank the gentleman very much for the compliment.

Mr. DAVIS. But whether we are going to have a vote during the next twelve hours or the next twenty-four——

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman voted for a recess or adjournment, I feel sorry that he did not succeed. If he did not vote that way, then I do not have any sympathy for him at all. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DAVIS. Are the proceedings that are taking place now in the nature of a filibuster?

Mr. KEIFER. No, sir; I am trying in my way to have this question understood. I heard your friend say that the rules of this House gave the Speaker and the Committee on Rules the right to govern it. There never was a greater falsehood in a parliamentary way uttered in the world than that. I challenge any man here to say that the Committee on Rules has ever forced anything on this House against its consent. The House must in all cases adopt any rule that the committee reports before it becomes operative.

A MEMBER. Everybody says so.

Mr. KEIFER. Somebody says, "Everybody says so." Nobody can mention an instance.

Mr. DAVIS. One more question and I will cease my annoyance and disturbance.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, it does not disturb me.

Mr. DAVIS. Is this delay in obtaining this vote in consequence of the hope or expectation that the morning train will bring in Members who will outvote the present majority in the House?

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman wants to put such a question as that, he should put it to somebody on the other side of the House who knows.

Mr. DAVIS. I thought the gentleman was well posted.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman sat here quietly while the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] talked about his sore toes and fingers for an hour and three-quarters and never put that question to him at all. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. That seems to be very amusing, but it does not apply to me, because I have not interrupted anybody before.

Mr. KEIFER. No; but you ought to have interrupted those who were taking so much of your precious time from your bed.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to interrupt those who are simply trying to delay the vote, not those who have been trying to expedite it.

Mr. KEIFER. It is easy to say that those who are trying to discuss this question on its merits are trying to delay, and that those who have taken up at least three-fourths of the time in the debate to-day are the only men who have acted virtuously at all.

Mr. JAMES. What has the gentleman to say about those on your side who made the motion to adjourn and take a recess. Were they attempting to delay or not?

Mr. KEIFER. No, sir.

Mr. JAMES. Oh, certainly they were not.

Mr. PAYNE. The House ought to have had sense enough to have adjourned at that time.

Mr. JAMES. The Speaker of the House ought to have had sense enough to rule on this question hours ago.

Mr. KEIFER. Now, Mr. Speaker, having discovered the trouble and having demonstrated something about this resolution that is claimed to be one of privilege; that is to say, that it is a high constitutional privilege to bring this resolution in here in violation of our present rules, and also a resolution that is to take from a majority of the House the right to select their own members of the Committee on Rules, which nobody who has read the resolution will dispute—it is the first time that that sort of thing has been attempted to be forced on the House, and especially under a claim of virtue, that we are doing it in the name of the Representatives of the great people of the United States, because we believe that a majority should rule.

But, Mr. Speaker, my attention was given a little bit ago to the matter of the powers of the Committee on Rules. I stated that that committee had never forced anything on the House in all its history. Gentlemen say it does everything, but they do not specify anything. I will give way if they will tell me.

Mr. NELSON rose.

Mr. KEIFER. Now, do not talk about something else. I am talking about the power of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. NELSON. This is the way it operates, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. KEIFER. I know how it operates.

Mr. NELSON. The Speaker is the chairman of the Committee on Rules, and he has appointed 56 chairmen of committees——

Mr. KEIFER. That is a question I am coming to about the Speaker. I want to confine myself to the point now up.

Mr. NELSON. I will explain it to you.

Mr. KEIFER. I may say truthfully that the Committee on Rules never did anything except with the approval of the House, and every special rule that led us to do business has been reported from the committee under the rules, debated, and adopted by that sanctified thing, the majority of the House. That is all there is of it. That is the whole of it. There is nothing in the fact that the Speaker is chairman of that committee. He has been chairman of the Committee on Rules ever since the time when James Buchanan was President of the United States, and there was a cabal in this Capitol arranging, planning, and meeting nightly for the purpose of devising plans to overthrow the Government.

Speaker James L. Orr, of South Carolina, was the first Speaker made chairman of the Committee on Rules, and this was in 1858. Now, since that time we have had some Democratic Speakers, and some pretty good ones too, and up to the present hour the Democrats did not want to depose him. The Democracy first made the place for him, and the Democracy when in power kept him in the place.

Now, it happens that a few fellows that seem to have trouble somewhere think they can strike a blow, not alone at the Speaker, but at the power of the majority elected to it, and this they claim to be a virtue. Why, we heard the debate at great length yesterday on a question of high constitutional privilege, and when men got up on the floor and almost with tears in their eyes begged that the Constitution should be overruled rather than to break down the rule for calendar Wednesday. Nearly every man who spoke on the subject voted against that rule. There were a few exceptions. I think I see the minority leader [Mr. CLARK] who talked effectively yesterday, and he was equally indignant when he voted against that rule, more so that now, for he talked of parting company with his Democratic brother [Mr. FITZGERALD] from New York.

Now he is appealing to us to put this new and undemocratic rule on the House, and to stand by it. We made the Wednesday calendar rule, we stand by it, and we did not undertake to depreciate it at all yesterday, notwithstanding we would uphold the dignity and power of the great commoner body of legislation for the Federal Government. We still conceive, and still believe, that that rule was subordinate to the higher rule of the Constitution of the United States, which stands as the organic law of this Government. We are for the rule now, and we were yesterday. To-day we are glad to see a few of the men who voted yesterday on the other side conclude that that was the only rule that had sanctity, that it only overruled the Constitution of the United States, and that to-day there are no rules that are so high as to be able to override the Constitution.

That is not all. We are dealing with a great question here of interest to the country. Some gentlemen say that the people will hear of what we are doing to-day, and condemn us. The people in my district certainly, according to my knowledge, will understand this question exactly.

They will understand that under cover of what might be said if I were outside of the House, false pretense under the guise of a resolution to take away the power of the majority. My people are intelligent enough to understand the question, and the great, patriotic, intelligent people of this country will understand that it is not a question of power that is being sought, but that it is a question of discord that is trying to be brought about, with the hope that the Democratic party will get into power again; and if they do, the same thing will happen that has happened before—it will fail.

I remember two years ago on this floor, from this spot, I expressed a good deal of comfort to the gentlemen on the other side when they were prophesying that the elections of 1908 were soon to come, when they would come into power. I said then that I felt happy that they could enjoy themselves in apparent expectation of victory, but that that would be all that they would get out of it.

I say the same thing now. You can fool the people by some sort of pretense here and there, but you can not fool them when you come to the period of dealing with great moral, material, and political questions of concern to this country which have been brought from time to time to the people on the final appeal.

There is no period in the history of this country when the people were more intelligent and able to understand the real questions than now. They are listening and they comprehend. Now, the talk to-day has mostly been against the Speaker, as though in some way or other he was to be humiliated. If these rules are not right, why do not you attack some substantial rule? The Committee on Rules is the only one you seem to attack, and my friend from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] seems to think that he has not introduced anything in that line.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. We want to understand over here if we correctly understood the gentleman when he got on his feet that he hoped that we would have a vote on this question to-night.

Mr. KEIFER. I did not say that.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The gentleman did not?

Mr. KEIFER. Sure; I did not.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The gentleman does not want a vote on it to-night.

Mr. TAWNEY. And one thing more; there are a lot of Democrats who do not want a vote on it to-night.

Mr. JAMES. Oh, give us a chance, and we will show you.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman will; yes.

Mr. KEIFER. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me read this Fowler resolution as I promised. This is House resolution 333, introduced by the gentleman from New Jersey, January 25, 1910, in this House, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives shall, on February 7, 1910, after the morning hour, proceed to the election of five additional members of the Committee on Rules, four of whom shall be Republicans and one a Democrat.

Resolved, That from and after the passage of this resolution the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall no longer be a member of the Committee on Rules; but that the Committee on Rules shall consist of the four members heretofore appointed and the five members elected under the provisions of this resolution.

That is, we are four-ninths Speaker appointments and five-ninths elected by the House, and the gentleman says that he is in favor of the present resolution. He has reformed somewhat in that respect.

Mr. FOWLER. Not at all.

Mr. KEIFER. Is not this the gentleman's resolution?

Mr. FOWLER. Just one moment. The point was to exclude the Speaker from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. KEIFER. That is another thing.

Mr. FOWLER. I have no difference with the gentlemen who are present members of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, no.

Mr. FOWLER. The point is that the Speaker should not be on the Committee on Rules.

Mr. KEIFER. He did get a little step toward favoring the electing of them by the House, but now he wants to surrender that and favor the resolution that does not give the House the right to appoint one of them.

Mr. FOWLER. They are to appoint them all.

Mr. KEIFER. Not one.

Mr. FOWLER. Why not?

Mr. KEIFER. Because the resolution provides otherwise, and that they shall be appointed in separate groups, and the House shall have no right to overthrow that appointment. Does the gentleman want to deny that?

Mr. FOWLER. If the House authorizes them to do it in that way, the House does it.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, my friend from New Jersey states a proposition that ought to be restated, I think. He says that if the House authorizes three men to make groups and they each select one member of the Committee on Rules, that the House does it. Now, let me put the question in this way: If the House authorizes the Speaker to appoint all the committees, then the House does it. [Applause and laughter.] That is all the logic there is in it.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. If the House would authorize the Speaker to introduce and pass all the bills and go home, would the House have discharged its duty and would he be acting for the House?

Mr. KEIFER. No; and anybody ought to have known that without asking the question. [Laughter.]

Mr. STANLEY. If either the gentleman from Ohio or I were to be judged by what we ought to know instead of what we do know, each of us would stand better before the country.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the gentleman is right; I agree with him. [Laughter.] I have been one of those through a pretty long life, who has always felt that there were a great many things that I did not know, and far more than I did know, and I have to feel kindly toward the man who will make the suggestion that is made by the gentleman from Kentucky [renewed laughter]; but there are some things, Mr. Speaker, that we can know and that we are not at liberty to be ignorant about.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to know why the Speaker does not rule right now.

Mr. KEIFER. Because he is trying to have the House keep order while we debate this proposition.

Mr. CLAYTON. He is trying to get your Republicans here who are out of town [laughter], trying to whip your crowd into line.

Mr. KEIFER. I am not trying to whip anybody into line. Nobody ever whipped me into line.

Mr. CLAYTON. Oh, the gentleman is trying to talk them into line. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. I am trying my best, Mr. Speaker, to address myself to the question, which is important and right that the House should have the right to make all of its rules.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman has been talking about what he knows and what he does not know. Does the gentleman know how much longer he is going to obstruct the proceedings of this House this evening? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KEIFER. Now, Mr. Speaker, here is another victim. [Laughter.] He has come to life for a moment, but he was asleep, mentally or otherwise, when the long speeches were being made in advocacy of a rule which takes from a majority of this House its right to govern and claiming that the resolution offered should have a privilege here. So long as they talked that and talked about the majority having a right to do things he kept still, but now he has awakened with his sore toe to the front. [Laughter.]

Now, I have great respect for him, and I think I ought to withdraw all that class of remarks, but he seems to think that I am not in earnest when I talk on this question, and that irritated me a little. [Laughter.] I do not believe that the resolution that is to take from the House its right to decide who shall constitute the Committee on Rules is one of high privilege. The second paragraph, I believe it is of section 5, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States, simply says, "each House may determine the rules of its procedure." Now, then, they say, "Oh, that means a lot; it means you may come in here and overthrow any rule that is made under the Constitution; after you have made it you may violate and overthrow it as a high constitutional privilege." Whoever heard of so absurd a thing? I repeat again if the rules that we have were made under the Constitution, then they are constitutional rules, and we should follow them and not disobey them; and this resolution should go under the rules now in force to the Committee on Rules.

You can discharge the Committee on Rules, if you please, and bring it back to the House, but if you are going to violate the rules we now have, I want the country to understand that you are doing what has never been done here before, that you are doing that which leads inevitably to anarchy and the overthrow of the power of the House to do the business we are sent here to do. That is the most important thing. It is not so very important, Mr. Speaker, whether you are to be chairman of the Committee on Rules or not. It is more important that we have a Committee on Rules that has been selected by the House and not by any sort of legerdemain such as is proposed here. It is of great importance to this great country that we should do business in the Congress of the United States. Gentlemen have been rather chary in talking about what kind of a rule they would want, and I believe my friend from New York [Mr. FISH] was one of those, with some others, perhaps, who has broken over a little and undertook to tell us what the rule was that he wanted, and he complained of some measure that he did not work out of a committee.

I have looked over to see how many bills we have had introduced up to this morning in this Congress, and we are not through with our virility on bills yet. There have been introduced in this House 23,140——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is in the House alone.

Mr. KEIFER. There have been introduced in the House 23,140 and in the Senate 7,228, making a total of 30,368. The gentleman suggests the rule by which we should be governed in considering them, and I figure out with some liberality the amount of time we should devote now to each of those bills, and I give it here that it would take a session of twenty-four hours a day, three hundred days in the year, twenty-four years to get through with what we have. [Laughter.] If you will cut it down to ten minutes on each of those bills, and will reduce the time to six hours a day that we should sit, and sit for only three hundred days in the year, it would still take a little over seven years to get through these bills that have already been introduced. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Now, this country is not fool enough to think that they have sent Representatives here who want to have rules of that kind, and every man who has been up here talking about the people not getting their rights through their Representatives and not getting a chance to get up their bills is advocating that same foolish thing. It is by reason of rules that we have legislated great things in this country. I could give instance after instance. I remember one where with one or two prominent exceptions on the Democratic side of the House, in 1882, we proceeded to legislate so as to strike down polygamy in this country, and with one or two exceptions the Democrats on the other side filibustered and did everything they could to defeat that legislation. They predicted all sorts of evil would come to the Republican party by what was denominated then "arbitrary rules" and ruling, if you please, of the Speaker, but we passed through the House and passed through the Senate a law that had one peculiarity in its results. It has been working out and solving the question of polygamy, but it had one peculiarity.

When it was well understood that it was going to be enforced the great leader of polygamy, Brigham Young, had a new dispensation from heaven, changing the idea that Mormonism stood for polygamy. It was because of the law we forced through here.

We had to put through in that Congress a bill that reduced the rate of letter postage from 3 to 2 cents under the same sort of opposition, and it stands to-day. The first bill that ever passed the Congress of the United States on the subject of the civil service was put through under such circumstances in the Forty-seventh Congress. And that is the law, with some amendments, to-day. Do you mean to say we ought to have thrown open the gates and said "Let every man jump on the floor and speak on his own bill as long as he pleases to go on?" If so, we would have had none of this wise legislation. We have passed many important measures in the last few sessions of Congress under a rule that came from the Committee on Rules.

But the rules were not adopted until after debate and after a majority of the House approved them. And that is all there is to it. I have seen a former leader on the Democratic side of the House come in here with a rule from the Committee on Rules and ask to have it forced through, and we have done so, and we have legislated by virtue of it. We will do that again, I think, but I presume the gentlemen imagine that we are to have a new committee of 15 on rules that will not do anything without they can get unanimous consent. Such a committee would not bring, I suppose, anything here that would hurt my feelings or some Democrat's feelings if they should not agree with it.

But I come back, Mr. Speaker, to the original question, and that is, that we are standing here for the rights of the majority, and we want to have rules submitted here through a Committee on Rules that a majority will approve, as in the past.

It seems to me that we may vote, not our sentiments and our judgment, but we may vote our piques and whims and motives, and all that, and through fear of our constituents at home maybe; but the better plan will be to stand square on our feet and uphold the principles of the Constitution and the greater principles upon which this Government shall stand, a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, worked out through their Representatives. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. STANLEY. Does the gentleman think that any Representative on the floor of this House, standing for 200,000 people, need fear his constituents if he votes for all the people and by the people?

Mr. KEIFER. That is a very simple proposition. You do not need an answer to that, do you? [Laughter.]

Mr. STANLEY. I was listening to the gentleman very carefully.

Mr. KEIFER. I think you were.

Mr. STANLEY. And I think he is not the judge of my listening.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, no.

Mr. STANLEY. I think the stenographer's notes will bear me out in this, that the gentleman said that Representatives on the floor of this House should not, on account of any fear of their constituents, fail to vote for a government of the people, for the people, and by the people, or words to that effect. I think there is a constituency, with the possible exception of the consistuency of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], that demands that a man shall not vote for just that sort of a government; and the gentleman begs the question. He is trying to get us away from the government of the people, for the people, and by the people, and for a government of a clique, for a clique, and by a clique, and that is all he is trying to do now.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, it hurts anything to hear that sort of a speech, because we all know that what we stand for is legislation, not by a clique, but by the majority, and that majority here is Republican. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. CLARK of Missouri rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Nebraska or the gentleman from Missouri, the leader of the minority side, but the Chair also desires to recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] before we are through.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until 11.55 a. m.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I make the point that the motion is dilatory.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Do I understand that the Chair recognizes me?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman arose at the same time as the minority leader arose, and the Chair during the evening frequently has had application from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who desires to discuss the point of order. The Chair desires to hear him, but will alternate either with the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] or the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the minority leader, as the gentlemen may agree.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, with all due deference to the Chair, that the Chair must have information enough by this time of night to rule on this question. If the Chair has not received parliamentary information enough to rule on this, he has picked up a great deal of valuable information on other subjects.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it is a question.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it not a fact that during all this debate, since the resolution was offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, that there has not been to exceed one hour of debate on the question on which the Speaker of this House is called upon to determine?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. That is the fault of the Speaker.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is the fault of the Speaker.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is not the fault of the Speaker.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is the business of the Speaker to decide points of order, and the point was made that somebody, I have forgotten who, was not speaking to the point of order.

Mr. HAMLIN. I made the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] made the point of order that somebody that was making a speech was not speaking to the point of order, and the Chair, not the regular Speaker, but the Speaker pro tempore——

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, it was——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Overruled the point of order. Now, what I say is this: If you have not information enough in a parliamentary way, with the best parliamentarian in the United States at your elbow, to enable you to decide the question, you certainly have picked up a great deal of strange information about polygamy [laughter] and the civil service, and the number of men who had pistols in their pockets in this House in 1882. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. I said that in answer to the suggestion that we had no right to debate this question at all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not see what pistols had to do with the debate.

Mr. KEIFER. They were Democrats that had them. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Suppose they did have them; it seems that you gentlemen over there laugh at the dullest wit that was ever in this House. [Great laughter and cheers on the Democratic side.] The mind of the gentleman from Ohio seems to have stopped working on the 4th day of March, 1883. [Laughter.] I did not start in to say things of that sort. Whatever other people may say, what I do say is that this point of order was raised about 2 o'clock. The speechmaking has been nearly entirely on the Republican side of this House; very little on this. Up until 10 o'clock the Speaker himself is responsible for this filibuster, for that is exactly what it is. At 10 o'clock the Speaker suggested that he would like for the House to adjourn. We ought to state the whole truth about it. Now, this is the most remarkable demonstration of the quality which the Speaker himself denied yesterday—of his being a czar—that has ever taken place in the history of the American House of Representatives. [Cheers on the Democratic side.] It is the extreme of autocracy.

I do not think that I am underestimating the intelligence of the Speaker when I say that he knew precisely how he intended to rule on this point of order the minute that it was raised. He has not picked up any valuable information on parliamentary subjects since then. I want the country to know that it was the regular Republicans, so called, headed by the Speaker himself, who have been reduced to the pitiful condition of carrying on a filibuster from 2 o'clock this afternoon until 10 o'clock at night. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Twelve o'clock.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But at 10 o'clock he asked the House to adjourn, and he ought not to be charged with the other two hours. If he rules with us, why then we will adjourn. [Laughter.] If he rules the other way, we will take an appeal from his decision and have it all over in an hour; and there is no sense or fairness or decency in wasting any more time on this proposition, because every man in the House has his mind made up. Therefore I suggest that it is high time for the Speaker to make his ruling one way or the other, and let us know where we are. It has been stated that the whole point of order is absurd, and the Chair ought to be required to rule on this point immediately. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, what is the situation before the House? [Cries of "Filibuster!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker it is a remarkable thing that the moment that side of the House gets in partial control of the House the effort is to stifle debate. [Applause on the Republican side; jeers on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JAMES. We have had nine hours.

Mr. MANN. The constant criticism, much of which has come from the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky who has just injected a remark out of order, on that side of the House comes at a time when this side has adopted a rule which concludes debate after days of debate. Now it is suggested that this side of the House is endeavoring to delay because it wishes to debate a great revolution precipitated upon this House this afternoon.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I do not yield. It is my desire to discuss for a short time the point of order pending before the House.

What is the situation? On yesterday the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] offered a resolution which he stated was privileged under the provisions of the Constitution, and was in order for that reason.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I do not.

Mr. STANLEY. I hope the gentleman will not decline to yield.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will permit me to make my argument without irrelevant interruption.

Mr. STANLEY. It is not like the gentleman from Illinois to decline or to conclude that it is irrelevant before he hears what it is.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker decided yesterday that the resolution was in order—as privileged under the Constitution. The House on appeal decided that it was not in order on yesterday. The question was again presented to-day, and the House decided that the resolution was in order to-day. It seems to me that the decision of the House in both cases can be clearly harmonized. The House decided to-day that the bill relating to the census was in order, as coming within a mandatory provision of the Constitution, while at the same time it decided yesterday that although the provision was mandatory for the House to act the House itself was the judge of the time when it should act, and that it might refuse consideration of the question when presented, or might, under a rule of the House, set apart one day of the week when the question should not be in order, as privileged or otherwise.

Now, following that decision to-day another question is presented as privileged under the Constitution. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] offers a resolution to amend the rules of the House, stating that it is a matter of high privilege, and that under the Constitution the resolution is in order, notwithstanding the rules of the House of themselves would not make it in order. If it be decided by the House that the resolution of the gentleman from Nebraska is now in order, it is upon the ground that under the Constitution of the United States, and regardless of the rules or any rules of the House, it is in order at any time for any Member of the House to rise in his place and say, "Mr. Speaker, I present a matter of high privilege. I offer a resolution to amend the rules, which, under the Constitution, I am privileged to offer, notwithstanding the rules of the House."

Mr. NELSON. May not the question of consideration be raised and the matter ended in that way?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me to proceed, I will discuss all these questions. Now, what is the situation, if that be the ruling? If it is decided by the House that it is a matter of constitutional privilege that the House can not deprive any Member of, to rise in his place and demand and receive the attention of the Speaker on a motion to amend the rules, what will be the result? Yesterday by a decisive vote of the House we preserved the rule of the House providing for calendar Wednesday. What is that rule of the House?

Rule XXVI, paragraph 4, provides:

> On Wednesday of each week no business shall be in order except as provided by paragraph 4 of Rule XXIV, unless the House by a two-thirds vote, on motion to dispense therewith, shall otherwise determine.

Another rule of the House provides:

> The Committee on Rules shall not report any rule or order which shall provide that business under paragraph 4 of Rule XXVI, shall be set aside by a vote of less than two-thirds of the Members present.

And yet if it be decided by the House that a motion to amend the rules is a constitutionally privileged question, which any Member can present at any time, I, or any one of a majority in the House may rise on next Wednesday and offer an amendment to the rules wiping out this two-thirds vote.

There are a number of provisions in the rules forbidding motions to be offered or requests to be made in the House. It is provided in the rules of the House in reference to the drawing of the seats, that no proposition for a second drawing shall be in order during that Congress. It is provided in reference to the Hall of the House that the Speaker shall not entertain a motion for the suspension of the rule which forbids the use of the Hall of the House for outside purposes.

And yet if this decision be rendered that it is a highly privileged matter under the Constitution, which privilege can not be taken away by the rules of the House, any Member may rise in his place at any time and offer an amendment to the rules of the House, either permanent or temporary, and present to the House a question which, under the rules adopted by the House, the Speaker is forbidden to have presented. So much for that.

What will be the result of a ruling that a motion to amend the rules is a privileged motion under the Constitution? If it is a privileged motion under the Constitution, no rule adopted by the House, either now or hereafter, can take away that privilege from any Member of the House. Gentlemen on that side of the House in the last few moments have intimated that Members on this side of the House in discussing questions before the House are filibustering. There never was, and there never will be, another plan so powerful in the hands of the minority for a filibuster as this proposition declaring that any Member at any time can challenge the attention of the House and present a privileged motion to amend the rules. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And while it is true that the question of consideration can be raised, and that it will not be necessary to consider the amendment to the rules with 100 Members alternating on the presentation of such a privileged motion and demanding a roll call on the question of consideration, a minority of the House could prevent the consideration of the business of the House forever.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Under the practice of the House, as it has developed in my time and, of course, in the time of the gentleman from Illinois, with such a situation as the gentleman has just described, does not the gentleman think that, under the rules of the House, with a succession of motions such as he suggests, they would be regarded as dilatory motions, and so ruled by the Speaker?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a matter which is privileged under the Constitution, like a call for the yeas and nays, can never be declared dilatory, unless it can be presumed that the Speaker, although sworn to obey the law and the Constitution, would attempt of his own free will to override it.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois three questions?

Mr. MANN. One at a time or all three together?

Mr. CLAYTON. I would not put all three together, because it might be asking too much at once.

Mr. MANN. Possibly so. The gentleman is great, and I might not be able to answer them at all.

Mr. CLAYTON. But not as great as the gentleman from Illinois, in his own estimation.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether that is true or not. The gentleman from Illinois has spoken courteously to the gentleman from Alabama, and regrets that he can not reply in kind.

Mr. CLAYTON. A remark from the gentleman from Illinois that he was not very courteous provoked one of like kind from the gentleman from Alabama, but the gentleman from Alabama apologizes to the gentleman from Illinois and to the House itself.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon; he misunderstood what the gentleman from Illinois said, because he said nothing to provoke a remark of that kind by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, it may be that my mental obtuseness led me into an error, and I accept the explanation of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I will be glad to have the questions.

Mr. CLAYTON. I desire to ask the gentleman if the question before the House now is not one of a parliamentary nature resting in the judgment of the Chair at this time; if it is not the determination of a parliamentary question belonging to the province of the Chair, and if that is not what is detaining the House at this time?

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought the gentleman from Alabama was going to ask all three questions together. It makes no difference to me.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman does not want to admit the first proposition, which I think he ought to answer in the affirmative. The next question I desire to ask the gentleman is, If it has not been frequently the practice on the part of the Chair that when a parliamentary question has been propounded for consideration and determination of the Chair that involved doubt, the Chair has frequently submitted that doubtful question to the House itself? Third, If the gentleman from Illinois does not know that this filibuster, this all-night session, would end in less than one hour if the Chair dared to submit this parliamentary question to the House itself for determination? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, although the gentleman from Alabama has not had the floor this evening, he has already talked more on this question than I have.

Mr. CLAYTON. But not half so well.

Mr. MANN. I am not filibustering.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have not accused the gentleman from Illinois of filibustering, but I do accuse the Chair of filibustering. I say that the Speaker in delaying this decision, by refusing to decide this question, by refusing to submit it to the House, is giving the greatest exhibition of the power of a czar that was ever exercised by any Speaker in this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is a remarkable thing that when the Speaker permits debate he is accused of being a czar, and when the Rules Committee, by a rule adopted by the House, cuts off debate, he is accused of being a czar for stopping debate. [Applause on the Republican side.] It will never be possible to satisfy my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] as long as there is a Republican Speaker in the chair.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to congratulate the gentleman upon the fact that he knows the mind and the wishes of the gentleman from Alabama better than the Speaker with his long experience can recognize how to rule on a plain parliamentary proposition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is another peculiar thing that the gentlemen of this House who have made up their minds to vote against sustaining the Chair in what they believe will be his opinion are all of the opinion that his duty is so plain it ought not to take him any time to render his decision. They believe that the Speaker's decision is unquestioned, that the rules and the Constitution are so plain, that the decision of the Speaker, of any Speaker, can be only one way, but have themselves resolved, notwithstanding their oaths of office, to vote the other way. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman says that it is an easy matter for the Speaker to determine.

Mr. CLAYTON. To submit it to the House.

Mr. MANN. Here is a question which I was endeavoring to show, if decided as the gentleman from Alabama will decide it, will paralyze the majority of the House.

Mr. CLAYTON. Let the paralysis begin.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I regret that my friend from Alabama, and I am sure that he will regret, that when I was speaking seriously to the House, he interrupts in this manner. I know that he does not intend——

Mr. CLAYTON. May I interrupt the gentleman one more time?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to have the gentleman answer the interrogatory I divided into three questions. He has not answered it yet. I shall be quite happy if he will elucidate the subject suggested by those three questions, and I would prefer a categorical answer on each question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have been discussing for a few moments the point of order. I supposed that the gentleman from Alabama was facetious when he asked me if the question before the House was a point of order pending, but if he does not know that that is the case, I will explain to the gentleman from Alabama that a resolution was offered claiming to be a privileged resolution under the Constitution, notwithstanding the rules, by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], and to that a point of order was raised, that it was not in order, and that that question is now pending before the House.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I make an observation there?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman said he would not interrupt me, and he wants to interrupt me every time I try to answer a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman decline to yield?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not decline to yield. If the gentleman wants to talk, I am willing.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not want to talk, but I just desire to say that I knew that myself, and I merely wanted to make the gentleman from Illinois confess that he knew that much.

Mr. MANN. Everybody else in the House except the gentleman from Alabama knew I was discussing a point of order, and if he will think long enough, it will get through his head after a while.

Mr. CLAYTON. Not by any argument made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. No; well, perhaps no argument would penetrate the gentleman's head.

Mr. CLAYTON. One that the gentleman is capable of making would not.

Mr. MANN. Well, this is all good natured on both sides. Let this side of the House remember that while Republicans are in the majority filibusters do occur. We remember in the Sixtieth Congress, I believe it was when Mr. Williams, the minority leader, conducted a filibuster here for weeks, exhausting every possible resource, including even the reading of the Journal in full. Does anyone here think that John Sharp Williams would have been so simple minded that he would not have used this resource if there had been a precedent and decision of the House? Is anyone on this side of the House so simple minded that he thinks that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the minority leader, if some proposition comes up in the House to which he is bitterly opposed, will not use every resource granted by the Constitution and the rules to prevent consideration?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. And does anyone think that if that side of the House should be in control and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] were on the floor, if he be here, desiring to delay, would not offer a privileged motion to amend the rules and get as many other Republicans as possible to do the same thing? Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Would not the privileged character which, under the decisions of the House, attaches to bills relating to the census, give the same opportunity for filibustering which you claim will be given under this kind of a resolution?

Mr. MANN. It would not, for this reason, which the gentleman from Washington will distinguish in an instant: It never has been held in this House that a gentleman from the floor of the House could offer a privileged motion in regard to the census. It has only been held that a report from the Committee on the Census in reference to taking the enumeration was privileged, and the House, or a majority of the House, can protect itself through the appointment of its committees. But here is a proposition which absolutely deprives the House of any control of a question through the rules, through the committees, through any other action it may take, because if it is declared by the House that a motion to amend the rules is privileged under that provision of the Constitution which says that the House may adopt rules for its own government, then the House has no power to interfere with the operation of the Constitution and has no power to prevent the presentation of a privileged question, nor can the Speaker in the chair decline to recognize a gentleman on the floor who states that he presents a matter of high privilege.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman if, in his judgment, a report of the Committee on the Census adds anything to the privileged nature of a census bill? If it is privileged, to put my question——

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. NORRIS. If it is privileged, as I understand it, it is so because the Constitution makes it so, so I can not see where the report of the committee would either take away or add to its privileged nature.

Mr. MANN. The question is a fair question and not hard to answer. As an original proposition, I do not think the gentleman from Nebraska would, and I doubt whether one-third of the House would, say that the census matter was a matter of privilege in the House——

Mr. NORRIS. I have already stated that before the House to-night; I agree with the gentleman on that proposition.

Mr. MANN. But at some time in the past, probably under some circumstances where the majority was endeavoring to present a census bill and the minority, under the old rules, was endeavoring to obstruct the consideration of the bill, some Speaker ruled that a report of the Committee on the Census, or whatever the old committee was which reported the census bill, was in order as a privileged matter. It was, in my opinion, a violent misconstruction of the provisions of the Constitution. It has stood as a precedent of the House from that time to this, being reiterated by the vote of the House to-day, that vote of the House being based, not on the language of the Constitution, but upon the precedents—previous rulings—and those rulings have only gone to the extent of providing that the report of the committee shall be privileged, while there are numerous rulings, not in reference to census reports, but other matters, that those matters are not privileged from the floor of the House. Now, the very fact that we to-day followed a precedent which we would not have adopted as an original proposition is what adds to the danger of now adopting a precedent which will come back to plague you gentlemen on that side of the House if you ever—and I am inclined to think that the time is not far distant when you will be in control of the House.

[Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not know whether that applause is because of the plague we will give them——

Mr. HARDWICK. We will take it, plague and all.

Mr. MANN. Or the trouble they will have when they get a majority—it will come back to plague you on that side of the House; it will come back to plague the gentlemen who are called, and I believe term themselves, insurgents, though Republicans, on this side of the House.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MANN. In a moment. As long as the filibustering in this House, which we all know was the common practice of the House prior to the Fifty-first Congress, was based only upon the rules, there was a method by a change of the rules to shut out the filibuster, but when a filibuster is based upon a constitutional privilege no rule of the House can change it.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. I have yielded to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON. The gentleman stated the answer in a way, but I will put it to him again. I was about to ask, if we erred, as the gentleman claims, in setting a bad precedent, why could we not change this by a rule at any time if this resolution carries? That is the very purpose of the committee, to propose changes in the rules. You say you can not do it because of a constitutional objection. Did we not answer that question in our vote on calendar Wednesday, saying they, too, were set aside?

Mr. MANN. We answered on calendar Wednesday that the House might provide that on one day of the week it could do the same thing that it does when it raises the question of consideration on a bill—decline to consider a privileged bill on a particular day. But no rule of the House can ever provide that a matter of high privilege under the Constitution to amend the rules, if this House shall determine it to be that way, can be abridged or denied by the rules of the House. I now yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Is the House to understand the gentleman to admit that this is a filibuster upon the Republican side of this House?

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman was going to ask me a question.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. That is the question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I will yield for a real question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This is a real question.

Mr. MANN. Well, the last one was not. I do not refer to the gentleman from Washington, however.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Would it not be in the power of the House at any time to stop a filibuster, even though the apprehensions of the gentleman from Illinois are true in regard to the danger of bringing up questions in regard to the rules? Could not the Speaker of the House now put a stop at once to these proceedings by ruling upon this question? Could not the House limit the debate or close the debate upon the question in regard to the rules, even though it should be privileged, and if subsequent questions in regard to the rules should be raised one after the other—a hundred men raising these questions—so that they would obviously be frivolous, and be ruled out of order by the Speaker as frivolous, being sustained by a majority of the House?

Mr. MANN. It may be that sometime this country will find a Speaker who will declare that a resolution in order and privileged under the Constitution is not privileged, but I hope such a man will never be found in the Speaker's chair. [Applause on the Republican side.] A resolution which is privileged under the Constitution can not be ruled out of order by the Speaker without the exercise and usurpation of arbitrary power.

The Constitution itself confers but few special privileges upon the Members of the House. One of those is the right to demand the yeas and nays by one-fifth of the Members present. Has any Speaker yet lived and occupied the chair who would dare to hold that the demand for the yeas and nays was frivolous or dilatory? Yet we all know that it is constantly used for delay. The gentlemen on that side of the House accuse us on this side of the House to-night of having the roll called several times for dilatory purposes. Will the time come when the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is in the chair and will be called upon by the gentleman from Washington to hold that the demand for the yeas and nays is dilatory or frivolous? And yet the two are upon a par if the House decides that this is a privileged resolution under the Constitution, and, notwithstanding, it is not in order under the rules of the House.

I know the feeling. I know the excitement in the House. I know the determined purpose of Members of the House to obtain a change in the Committee on Rules; but I ask the House to remember that its decisions are not of light weight. That which the House solemnly declares to-day it can not well change to-morrow; and if we, in the determination to change the rules of the House, shall so violate the rights and privileges of the House itself, we may also regret the day.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman advise the House what, in his opinion, would be the parliamentary procedure necessary for this House to have a new Committee on Rules?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I know that some of the gentlemen in the House may need a legal adviser, but I am not undertaking to advise men on the other side who are seeking to do that which I do not believe in, and I say that in all candor to the gentleman.

Mr. JAMES. Is it not true that while the gentleman withholds his store of wisdom, which he has a perfect right to do, from the House, at the same time his contention really is that this House is powerless to change the Committee on Rules during the Sixty-first Congress?

Mr. MANN. That is not my contention at all. I think the House has full power to act.

Mr. JAMES. How would we act?

Mr. MANN. If I were on that side of the House and seeking to accomplish what the gentleman is, I would endeavor to show the House.

Mr. JAMES. I regret that the gentleman is not on this side——

Mr. MANN. Sometimes I regret that myself.

Mr. JAMES. So that we might have the benefit of his great wisdom. But, as I understand, his contention is we are going to commit a great outrage in overruling the Chair. Perhaps he can advise us of some way in which it can be done in an orderly way without this revolution which, it is said, we are about to inaugurate. He may be able to suggest an orderly manner in which to do what the majority of this House desires and intends to do, which is to make a change as to the Committee on Rules, so this House may be its own master.

Mr. MANN. I have a habit, as well as I can, of discussing the propositions which are before the House. I have seldom indulged—and I have no criticism of those who do—in discussing propositions which are not before the House. At this late hour, with the innuendo of gentlemen on that side of the House——

Mr. JAMES. It is early now.

Mr. MANN. That I am indulging in a filibuster, I do not care to conduct a parliamentary school for the benefit of that side of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I have already delayed the House longer than I intended, longer than I should have done had not various Members interrupted me.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STANLEY. I thank the gentleman for the delayed courtesy. In the beginning of this debate it was alleged by quite a number of gentlemen on the other side that this motion of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was not made in good faith, and that the contention that this was a constitutional privilege was an absurdity, not worth serious consideration. I want to ask the gentleman if he agrees with that opinion expressed by his colleagues?

Mr. MANN. I heard no such statement made, and I am stating my own opinion on the floor of the House.

Mr. Speaker, it is a popular belief in the country and in the House that the Committee on Rules dominates the House. I have been a Member of this House now for thirteen years, and have had more or less to do with certain important bills, one creating the Department of Commerce and Labor, one the pure-food law, one the Hepburn Act, to amend the act regulating commerce, and various bills of that kind—important measures—among the most important measures that have passed the House. I do not refer to them with a view of adding to the importance of the work I did in connection with them, because that was of small moment, but because the bills impressed themselves upon me. Not one of those laws was passed under a special rule of the House limiting debate or cutting off the right of amendment.

It is not true, as many believe, that the Speaker, through the Committee on Rules, controls the House. It is not true that the Committee on Rules does control the action of the House.

It is not true that the Committee on Rules decides the usual programme of legislation or what shall be considered in the House, or that it in any way affects ordinary bills or legislation in the House. The Committee on Rules is merely an instrumentality of the majority to bring speedily before the House some occasional measure which otherwise would be unduly delayed or to give to the House a chance to consider and vote upon a partisan matter over the attempts of the minority to delay or obstruct.

I recently read in an article by a noted newspaper and magazine writer a statement that no bill could come to a final vote in the House of Representatives without action by the Committee on Rules, and this seems to be a quite prevalent belief. Nothing could be farther from the actual truth. In the last, or Sixtieth, Congress, which expired on March 4, 1909, there were two sessions, and at these two sessions 629 public bills and joint resolutions were enacted into law. During the same time the Committee on Rules acted only 21 times, and most of their reports did not refer to any pending bill. For instance, at the first session of that Congress there were 269 public bills and joint resolutions passed, and there were 15 reports from the Committee on Rules. One of these reports related to giving the Philippine Commissioners privileges of the House floor; another, an expenditure committee authority to require attendance in an investigation being made; another referred a legal proposition to the Committee on the Judiciary; another provided for investigation of peonage; another for the Lilly investigation.

From the opening in December to April 3, 1908, not a single bill had been passed under a report from the Rules Committee, but on April 3, 1908, there was in progress a Democratic filibuster in the House to prevent legislation, and from April 3 to April 20 there were 7 reports from the Committee on Rules, all caused by the Democratic filibuster, and not one of which related to any special bill to which there was objection. The last rule reported at that session of Congress from the Committee on Rules provided for the pulp and paper investigation.

At the second session of the Sixtieth Congress there were 360 public bills and joint resolutions passed. There were 6 reports from the Committee on Rules. Two of these were for the partisan purpose of permitting President Taft to carry out his expressed desire of appointing Senator Knox as Secretary of State, 1 related to the infantry trouble at Brownsville, 2 related to providing a calendar Wednesday in the House, and the other one did not relate to any particular bill. During the entire Sixtieth Congress, of the 629 public bills and joint resolutions passed, not a single one was considered and voted upon in accordance with and by virtue of an order or report from the Committee on Rules, and only 3 were brought up for consideration under a special order of the Committee on Rules, and those 3 were: District of Columbia appropriation bill, naval appropriation bill, and the bill providing for an investigation of the Brownsville trouble.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Is it not true that one rule brought in by the Committee on Rules at the session of which the gentleman speaks was so drawn that it applied to practically every bill that came up, so that it took only a majority vote to suspend the rules, and that by virtue of the provision it became impossible for any man on the floor of this House to attempt to amend bills that in the ordinary course of business would have been open to amendment?

Mr. MANN. It is true that one of the reports from the Committee on Rules at the first session of the Sixtieth Congress during the Democratic filibuster, and caused by the Democratic filibuster, was the rule authorizing a suspension of the rules of the House by a majority vote. But it is also true that that was a general rule for the balance of the session, and that no report from the Committee on Rules specifically applied to any particular bill. No preference was given to one bill over another.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman if in the Sixtieth Congress the Committee on Rules did not bring in a rule that forced the Vreeland-Aldrich currency bill through after an hour and a half or two hours' debate, one of the most important bills ever brought into the House.

Mr. MANN. If it did I am mistaken. I think not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You have been here thirteen years and I have been here fifteen.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not true that it is just such abuses as that by the Committee on Rules that have produced the agitation against the power of the Committee on Rules with the Speaker at its head?

Mr. MANN. I do not remember distinctly with reference to the passage of the Vreeland currency bill, whether it came from the Committee on Rules or not. I have here a transcript from the minutes of the Committee on Rules which I obtained last summer, and that transcript does not show any report from the Committee on Rules on that subject.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then, the transcript is not right. One more question: Is not the sum and substance of your argument this, that if the majority is a Speaker's majority it has a right to do as it pelases, but if it is an anti-Speaker's majority there ought not to be any attention paid to it?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Missouri usually asks serious questions, but I think that one is not so intended. Now I will answer the first question of the gentleman. The Vreeland-Aldrich bill was not considered in the House under a report from the Committee on Rules, and I put my memory against that of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask this question about it: Is it not true that they allowed only forty or forty-five minutes' debate on a side, and that no amendment was allowed, and the bill was rushed through in that style?

Mr. MANN. It was not rushed through any more than the gentleman from Missouri is now seeking to rush through the House this proposition. He complained then that he was not allowed to debate, and now he complains because I am.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. I always yield to my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. JAMES. I do not believe the gentleman from Illinois wants to state to the House that the Vreeland-Aldrich bill was not considered in the House on a rule reported by the Committee on Rules, because that is the real fact about it, and the further fact is that only forty minutes' debate on each side was allowed for the discussion of that measure. I state that, because I myself was a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency and participated in that debate, and the twenty minutes allotted to this side was between JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS and myself, Mr. PUJO, and Mr. GILLESPIE of Texas.

Mr. MANN. Now, if gentlemen will permit me to proceed and not go any further in making errors, exhibiting a natural failure of memory in reference to the subject—and I have no criticism of that, because my memory is often at fault, but sometimes a man standing on his feet has his memory refreshed, because his mind works more rapidly than at other times—I want to say that the Vreeland bill was not considered in the House under a report from the Committee on Rules, my friend from Kentucky to the contrary notwithstanding.

I will tell him how it was considered, and when I do, doubtless his memory will be refreshed. I have just stated that owing to the Democratic filibuster—and I use the term with no opprobrium—the Committee on Rules had reported a rule that there might be a suspension of the rules without a two-thirds vote, that the suspension might come at any time, I believe, and this Vreeland bill was considered under an order passed under a suspension of the rules. It is true that as an ultimate result of the report and adoption of that report from the Committee on Rules changing the rules for the balance of that session of Congress the Vreeland bill was considered, but there was no special exception made by the Committee on Rules in reference to the Vreeland bill. Does not the gentleman admit that I am right and that he is wrong?

Mr. JAMES. But the gentleman is bound to admit that what I stated at first is true, and that he is making a distinction between tweedledee and tweedledum. It was the report of the Committee on Rules that enabled the bill to be considered, and the time allowed was only twenty minutes on each side.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is certainly mistaken. I had discussed that question before the gentleman interrupted me.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman is exactly right upon the proposition as he states it, but without the report of the Committee on Rules the bill could not have been considered in that way at all. Is not that true?

Mr. MANN. It is not true.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman's own statement shows that it is true.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. For the purpose of getting the thing right, I have a recollection of what occurred at that time. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he does not remember that at that time on the Vreeland-Aldrich bill there was a rule that provided that the minority bill introduced by the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. Williams, could be offered as a substitute, and the motion was not made by the gentleman from Mississippi but made by the gentleman from California.

Mr. MANN. That was not done under a report from the Committee on Rules. There was no special report of the Committee on Rules, and the Committee on Rules never acted upon any rule presented to the committee in reference to the Vreeland bill.

Mr. NORRIS. How could it have occurred without any special report? I am not claiming to remember definitely how it happened, but I do not see how it could have occurred.

Mr. MANN. I can explain how it might have occurred, although I have not refreshed my recollection as to how it did occur. It might easily occur by some gentleman offering a resolution from the floor of the House and moving to suspend the rules and pass the resolution. It did not occur, I say to the gentleman from Nebraska, by a report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. KEIFER rose.

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to say in answer to the gentleman from Kentucky that I know the bill came in here. I was opposed to it, and I had one hour in opposition to it when it was being considered. The speech is now in my desk.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to prolong the discussion about the Vreeland bill. I now hold in my hand the RECORD showing what took place at the time, and it shows that my memory was right and that the memory of the gentleman from Missouri happens at this particular time to be wrong.

It is a further fact that of the numerous private bills which were passed at the Sixtieth Congress not a single one was in any way referred to in any act or report of the Committee on Rules. It should be further remembered that the Committee on Rules has no power except to report a proposition to the House, and that such proposition has no effect until passed by a majority vote. It will be difficult for people who believe that the Speaker controls the House through the Committee on Rules to accept the truth of these statements, and yet they are unquestioned. There can be no controversy about them. I make them from personal knowledge and from an examination of the records. The Committee on Rules is, in the main, a reserve power which is rarely used in the House. A legislative body must in some manner give the right to its majority to effect legislation, but a majority may at any time become a minority, and minorities always desire to have rights, and the majority, which may to-morrow be a minority, does not wish to make precedents which will be oppressive.

The truth is that the complaints that the Speaker, under the rules, is an autocrat usually emanate from those who have urged that the Speaker use autocratic power in their behalf or prostitute the personal and reserve power of the Committee on Rules to further their pet measures. When the Speaker has declined so to do—and he could not last long as Speaker if he acceded to such requests—and refused to use his personal and official influence to further measures which were otherwise being duly considered, he has been denounced as an autocrat because he would not attempt to be one. The Committee on Rules is only called into play in case of emergency, and if the Speaker yielded to the demands of every advocate that his particular measure should be considered an emergency he would undertake to determine practically all the bills to be brought before the House, without regard to the ordinary practice and rules of the House, and would thereby endeavor to make an autocrat of himself, and if he did he would not last a single session.

There are many other things which might be said pertinent to the subject. The rules of the House are not perfect. I have endeavored to study the rules, to analyze them, to learn them and be ready to apply them in the practical work of legislation. I sometimes think most of those who criticise the rules have never fully studied them and do not quite know what they are. It is possible to make improvements in the rules. We made some in the Sixtieth Congress. We made some in the special session of the present Congress. We make some further improvements as men find the necessity for them, but in the main the rules represent the legislative wisdom of a century. They represent the accumulated acumen of the statesmen during the period of our history. They have changed some with the changing conditions and enlargement of the House. They seek to give the rights of the minority and yet to give to the majority an opportunity to enact legislation. Talking is not legislating. The rules give plenty of opportunity for talking and permit the majority to force a vote at the proper time. On the whole, the rules of the House are probably the best considered, most scientifically constructed and finely adjusted rules governing any parliamentary body on earth. The proceedings in the House, while sometimes boisterous, are always orderly. No such scenes and no such arbitrary action can take place in the House as I have often witnessed in the city council of Chicago and the legislature of my State. But there never has been and there never will be any set of rules devised by which each one of 400 Members of the House can at any time bring each one of 30,000 bills before the House for immediate consideration and disposal.

Just what are the objections to Speaker CANNON and what is meant by "Cannonism" or "anti-Cannonism" I confess I do not fully understand; but it is quite evident that among many citizens of intelligence, worth, and patriotism there is a decided and bitter feeling, or prejudice, either personally directed against Speaker CANNON or against the principles and methods of legislation which he is supposed to represent. This opinion, as I believe, is largely based upon false information and erroneous views and beliefs, both as to the personal attitude of the Speaker and his official power under the rules of the House.

I assume that the main objections to the present Speaker are based on the proposition that, under the rules of the House, he is an autocrat, practically all powerful, and as such is opposed to and prevents consideration of the progressive measures and the enactment into law of the progressive ideas demanded by an enlightened public. The charge is frequently made, and, probably, quite generally believed, that the Speaker controls the consideration of bills in the House of Representatives and largely dominates their form and substance if enacted into law. If this be true, and Mr. CANNON is held personally responsible for the failure to consider measures and to enact proposed and desired legislation, because he is all powerful in the House, then he should by the same reasoning be given credit for the great measures which have been enacted during his speakership. It is certain that more great measures, tending to ameliorate and better the condition of the people and to respond to the moral and industrial uplifting of mankind and to conform to the progress of the times have been passed into law while he has been Speaker than during any other equal period of time in our country's history. Among many others may be noted the following:

Pure-food law; actual governmental control of railroad rates and railroad accounting; providing additional safety and safeguards for railroad employees; scientific study of means to prevent railway accidents; the employers' liability law; providing compensation for employees injured in the government service; to restrict immigration and prevent improper immigration; irrigation and reclamation of arid lands; providing commissions to study river improvement and currency reform; enlarging the powers, duties, and effectiveness of the Forest Service; the testing of coal and other natural resources by the Geologic Survey; placing the Bureau of Standards on a solid footing; the regulation of dams constructed for water power and withholding by general act of Congress unlimited franchises for either dams or bridges in, across, or over navigable streams; a strict anti-rebate law; revising and codifying the penal statutes; the regulation of interstate shipments of intoxicating liquors; the pulp and paper investigation.

These and many other measures of great and general importance have been carried through during the Speakership of Mr. CANNON. If he is to be blamed for what has not been done during his term as Speaker, on the ground that he is all powerful in the House, then he must be credited with the great measures which have been enacted during the period.

It is not true that the present Speaker is opposed to progressive measures. It is true that he does not accept the word of every promoter of a scheme for reform that such scheme will be beneficial. Speaker CANNON has always been willing to listen, but he must be convinced of the merits of a proposition before he advocates it or uses his personal influence, unless it becomes a public matter, when he always stands with the controlling majority of his party friends in the House.

It is not true that Speaker CANNON or any other Speaker is an autocrat in the House. It is true that the present Speaker is the leader and strongest influence in the House, and that he has been so for ten years, dating back to a time before he was Speaker and from the time that Speaker Reed left the House. We may some of us revile him temporarily. Great men have been abused at all times—such is the history of mankind—but when the book of history of this generation shall have been written, together with the legislation that has been enacted, the years of the speakership of Mr. Speaker CANNON will stand out among the most brilliant in the history of our country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

DESERT-LAND ENTRIES IN IMPERIAL COUNTY, CAL.

Mr. FLINT. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6636) for the relief of assignees in good faith of entries of desert lands, to report it favorably with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 423) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BORAH. Is there a report with the bill?

Mr. FLINT. There is a very long report. The report includes the testimony of the Assistant Attorney-General of the Interior Department, who appeared before the committee.

Mr. BORAH. I have no desire to object to the consideration of the bill, but one can not tell what it is from a hasty reading at the desk.

Mr. FLINT. I can state it in a few words.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to have the Senator from California make a brief statement as to what the bill is.

Mr. FLINT. The bill provides that entries of desert land in Imperial County, Cal., fraudulent in the inception, that have been assigned to innocent parties may be proved up by the parties making affirmative proof that they had no knowledge of the fraud and that they have performed the work required under the desert-land act since the assignment.

Mr. BORAH. Is the bill confined to one county in California?

Mr. FLINT. It is confined to one county in California.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator from California if the bill would have the effect of making the Government liable in case of a defective title?

Mr. FLINT. There is no liability upon the Government at all.

Mr. PAGE. There is now before the Committee on Claims a bill to make good to certain parties who had taken up lands under the homestead laws, where it appears that certain grants overlapped each other and that a railroad company claiming title, having been dispossessed temporarily by the order of the Department of the Interior, allowed these homesteaders to go on the land. The railroad company afterwards brought the matter before the courts, and the Supreme Court held that they were entitled to the land. The result is that we are now asked to pay a large bill because those homesteaders have been ejected by the railroad company.

I should like to know if this bill does not possibly bring us within the scope of a liability which will make us hereafter subject to some claim on the part of those who have title to the land.

Mr. FLINT. It bears no relation to that matter at all. This bill provides that where a desert-land entry was fraudulent in its inception and afterwards assigned, the person who accepted that assignment and had no knowledge of the fraud may prove up and obtain a patent. It has nothing to do with the character of claim the Senator speaks of.

Mr. PAGE. I do not quite understand why a law which is designed to affect some particular locality should be taken up under the pressure of a request of this kind and forced through without knowledge regarding its provisions.

Mr. FLINT. I have no objection, if the Senator desires that the bill shall go over. If he wishes to have it go over he can make the request. However, I am very anxious to have its consideration concluded. It is a matter of local interest.

Mr. PAGE. I withdraw the objection, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 3, after the words "That any person," to insert the words "other than a corporation;" in line 4, after the words "desert-land entry," to insert "in Imperial County, California;" in line 6, after the word "assignment," to insert the words "at the time of transfer;" and on page 2, line 5, after the word "accomplished," to insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize any person to hold, by entry or assignment, a quantity of land in excess of the amount authorized by law prior to the passage of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person other than a corporation who has, in good faith, heretofore acquired by assignment a desert-land entry in Imperial County, Cal., which entry is regular upon its face, in the belief that he was obtaining valid title thereto, which assignment at the time of transfer has been accepted and recognized by the Interior Department as a proper transfer of such entry, shall be entitled to complete the entry so acquired: Provided, however, That this act shall only apply to any person who, at the time of receiving such assignment, was without notice of any fraud in the entry assigned, or in any annual proof made concerning the same: Provided further, That patent shall not issue to any such assignee unless he shall affirmatively establish, by his evidence under oath, good faith and lack of notice of fraud, and by the testimony under oath of himself and at least two witnesses that expenditure in the total amount and cultivation and reclamation to the full extent required by law have been actually made and accomplished: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize any person to hold, by entry or assignment, a quantity of land in excess of the amount authorized by law prior to the passage of this act: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to in any manner waive or avoid liability, on the part of the person committing the same, for any fraud or violation of the law.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of assignees in good faith of entries of desert lands in Imperial County, Cal."

Mr. DICK. I report back favorably with amendments from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (H. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 6, before the word "railway," to strike out the article "a;" in line 9, after the word "such," to strike out the words "line or lines" and insert "terms and in such location;" and in section 2, on page 2, line 5, after the word "occupied," to strike out the word "or" and insert "shall be," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Lawton and Fort Sill Electric Railway Company, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Oklahoma, be, and the same is hereby, empowered to survey, locate, construct, maintain, and operate railway, telegraph, telephone, and trolley lines through the Fort Sill Military Reservation, in Comanche County, State of Oklahoma, upon such terms and in such location as may be determined and approved by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That said corporation is authorized to occupy and use for all purposes of railway, telegraph, telephone, and trolley lines, and for no other purpose, a right of way 50 feet in width through said Fort Sill Military Reservation, with the right to use such additional ground where cuts and fills may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of the roadbed, not exceeding 100 feet in width, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided, That no part of the land herein authorized to be occupied shall be used except in such manner and for such purposes as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railway, telegraph, telephone, and trolley lines; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used such portion shall revert to the United States: Provided further, That before the said railway company shall be permitted to enter upon any part of said military reservation a description by metes and bounds of the land herein authorized to be occupied or used shall be approved by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That the said railway company shall comply with such other regulations and conditions in the maintenance and operation of said road as may from time to time be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Lawton and Fort Sill Electric Railway Company to construct and operate a railway, telegraph, telephone, and trolley lines through the Fort Sill Military Reservation, and for other purposes."

Mr. DICK. The bill just passed is precisely the same as Senate bill 5905, which was passed by the Senate on the 25th of February. I move that the House of Representatives be requested to return the bill to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DICK. I enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which Senate bill 5905 was ordered to a third reading and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE. Is the morning business concluded?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The consideration of the morning business is not yet concluded.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I will wait until the end of the morning business, of course.

Mr. NELSON. I trust the Senator will yield to me to call up a little local bill to extend the time for the building of a dam. The time is out now, and it is important that the bill should be passed immediately.

Mr. DIXON. Under the circumstances I will agree to let it go over, although I am very anxious to have the bill reported and get the committee to work. I might ask the Senator from Illinois whether the Committee on Foreign Relations on Monday will still contend that it is a subject for the jurisdiction of that committee or not?

[The speech commenced by Mr. CUMMINS on March 15, continued on March 16 and 17, and concluded to-day, is here printed in full.]

Tuesday, March 15, 1910.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the bill under consideration proposes certain additions and amendments to the several statutes which, taken together, are popularly known as the interstate-commerce law. In the authority of Congress to regulate and control common carriers, there lies a greater power to promote the general welfare than can be found in any other provision of the Constitution. For twenty-three years the Federal Government has been attempting to protect the people against excessive and discriminatory charges for interstate transportation. After each attempt experience speedily disclosed fatal weaknesses in the legislation adopted. The act of 1906 has shared the fate of all its predecessors, and we are now confronted with the imperative and important duty of strengthening the interstate-commerce law so that it may accomplish the objects which are universally accepted as the proper objects to be attained.

My chief purpose in addressing the Senate at this time is to analyze the measure that has been reported by a majority of the Interstate Commerce Committee from the standpoint of the minority report presented by the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] and myself, and to propose such amendments to the bill as will, we hope, make it an effective instrument of regulation; but, in view of the extraordinary circumstances which surround the bill, and of my intent to comment upon the relation which ought to exist between the executive and legislative branches of the Government with respect to legislation, I believe it to be my duty to inquire into the origin of the bill, and to trace its evolution into its present form.

This bill is not the product of any Senator or of any Member of the House of Representatives, and it has never been considered by the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate in the sense in which it is the obligation of every committee of the Senate to consider a bill before it is reported. According to the unchallenged reports of the public press, certain gentlemen, namely, the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, two members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and a Representative in Congress, met in New York on the 30th day of August of last year to consider and put in the form of a bill the views which the President of the United States had at various times expressed with regard to amendments of the interstate-commerce law. This supervisory and unofficial commission, I will assume, acted under the invitation or command of the President.

The result of its labors, while bearing date September 2, did not, in fact, come into the hands of the President, as I have been informed, until about November 10. I have seen the report of these pioneers of the present bill. Indeed, I have a copy of it on my desk at the present moment. It was printed for the confidential use of the President, but it quickly became public property, and was in the hands of the railroads even before it reached the President. Remember that I suggest no want of good faith in this, because a public measure of such sort ought to be in the hands of those who are to be affected by it. I do not intend to refer to it at this point further than to say that, were it not for the birthmark of the commerce court, which has distinguished the bill in all its stages, the gentlemen who sat upon the matter in New York would not be able to recognize in the bill which finally emerged from the Attorney-General's office, and which passed through the committee without consideration or amendment on February 25, the measure that was born in the dog days of the year before.

With the return of the President from his western tour on November 10 the campaign began, and between that time and January 11, that being about the day upon which the bill came from the Attorney-General to the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee for introduction into the Senate, nearly every important railroad president in the United States visited Washington and was heard by the President and the Attorney-General in opposition to certain features of the proposed bill. Some of them were heard not once, but twice and thrice. During the same period and before the same tribunal representatives of the shippers were also heard.

Mark you, I do not complain of the appearance of the railroad presidents to urge objections to the passage of any law that will affect the business and property which they represent; and if the President and the Attorney-General are to prepare bills which Congress is to pass simply because the executive branch of the Government wants them passed, then it was eminently appropriate that the hearings upon the present bill should take place before the men who were to decide what the bill should be. It is, however, a significant fact that in the hearings held by the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate no railroad man, save one, had a word to say either for or against the measure, although they filled up the committee room every day given to the hearings. The single exception to which I have referred was an appearance by the general counsel of the Rock Island Railroad, who contented himself with an argument against the constitutionality of that section of the measure which purports to regulate the capitalization of railroads.

My protest against the course of this bill is not because the railroad men were heard, but because they were not heard in the proper forum. Between the 10th of November and the day upon which the bill left the hands of the Attorney-General for the hands of the distinguished Senator from West Virginia many and radical changes were made; and so far as I can now recollect substantially every change was made to remove an objection urged by the railroads. As I proceed I shall point out these changes; but just now I am dealing with the unfortunate practice which the history of this bill has disclosed. The Senate does not know and never can know what the arguments or showings were that led to these changes. I am very far from imputing any improper motive to either the President or the Attorney-General. I assume that they believed that they had good reason for yielding to the importunities of these representatives of the railways; but I deplore the introduction of a custom which leads those who desire to influence legislation to the White House rather than to the committees of Congress. If these railroads had appeared before us, what they said and what they presented would have been preserved and laid before the Senate, and such weight could now be given to their facts and their arguments as they deserve; but as it is, we have a bill modified in the most important respects upon their demand and do not know their reasons for insisting upon the demand.

Those of us who still maintain some admiration for the Government which the fathers of the Republic established, with its clear and positive distinctions between executive, judicial, and legislative functions, can not accept, without an expression of dissent, the obliteration of these fundamental principles.

Pursuing the history of the matter, you will remember that I have brought you down to the day upon which the bill was introduced and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. After the lapse of two weeks or more we held our first meeting of the session and determined that those who were interested in the bill should be heard. During four or five days various representatives of shipping and commercial organizations and officers and agents of steamboat and steamship lines and the Interstate Commerce Commission were heard. All of them suggested amendments, some of them very important, some of them unimportant. In the meantime the Attorney-General had not only proposed certain changes, but had practically rewritten section 13 of the bill, expanding it into its present form. These changes and revisions had been printed by the committee, so that in fact the bill before us was not the bill originally introduced by the Senator from West Virginia, but a very different measure. After we had finished the open hearings the Attorney-General met with us upon three different days, and we had a running discussion with him that resulted in one or two modifications that he accepted.

I pause here to say, in behalf of the Attorney-General, that I impute nothing but the highest motives to him, and I accord to him extraordinary learning and skill in the profession of which he is so distinguished an ornament.

We met the next morning, as I supposed, to consider the bill—that was after the running discussion with the Attorney-General for three days, during which time he proposed further amendments to the bill—and the various amendments which either had been or would be suggested. The final and ultimate revision of the Attorney-General had just been put in type, and no member of the committee had read it, nor had any member of the committee had a chance to read it. In addition to the amendments that had been brought to our attention by the several representatives of commercial organizations, water lines, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, I had before me a number of amendments which seemed to me essential and which are, in a general way, outlined in the minority report.

I speak of this simply that Senators may all know that this bill is here, not only without a maker, but without a guarantor or indorser. It is afloat in the channels of legislation without any of the guaranties which usually surround bills when they come before the Senate for consideration. I am not criticising the committee. I am suggesting these things only that I may have a fair field in the argument I am about to make, unimpeded and unobstructed by any imaginary consideration of the bill by the members of the committee.

In addition to these various amendments of which I have spoken, presented by shippers, civil organizations, commercial organizations, by steamboat and by steamship lines, and by the Interstate Commerce Commission, as I said, I had prepared certain amendments which seemed to me ought to become a part of the bill; but it did not so transpire.

After a statement by a prominent and influential member of the committee that it was useless to consider the bill at all or to take up for discussion any of the changes which had been earnestly insisted upon by those who had appeared before us, but that the thing to do was to report the bill for passage exactly as it came from the pen of the Attorney-General, a motion was made that instructed the chairman of the committee to introduce that morning the last revise of the Attorney-General (which at the time no member of the committee had read) have it referred to the committee, and then report it without change of any kind for passage. This is the history of the bill No. 6737, now before the Senate; and if the uncontradicted and repeated and apparently authorized statements of the newspapers be not in error, every Republican, at least, is expected to vote for it just as it is, unless he dares to incur not only the executive displeasure, but banishment from the Republican ranks.

I do not speak of this phase of the bill in a spirit of anger. I am conscious of no other sentiment than profound regret. I recognize that it is not only the privilege, but the duty, of the President of the United States to make such recommendations to Congress as in his judgment will best promote the general welfare. He is quite within both his privileges and his duties in expressing his views upon such subjects as often as he likes and as emphatically as he pleases. Whether he is within his privilege or his duty when he undertakes to prescribe the precise form which legislation shall assume may well be doubted. His great predecessor evidently thought that executive propriety did not permit it, for when he was dealing with the same subject, in his message at the beginning of the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress in 1905, he said:

> It is not my province to indicate the exact terms of the law which should be enacted, but I call the attention of the Congress to certain existing conditions with which it is desirable to deal.

I would not, however, be inclined to attach so much importance to the practice which now seems to be very general were it not that its consequences must in the very nature of things be disastrous. Although a Senator may be in full sympathy with the broad purposes which the Executive proposes to accomplish, the moment he asserts his independent view of the best way to accomplish the purpose, he finds himself in direct conflict with the President, and he must choose between losing the presidential favor and doing the thing as his conscience tells him it ought to be done. The result will inevitably be that he must either surrender his independence or be in constant and most disagreeable conflict with the Chief Executive.

But the discomfort which attends exclusion from the executive circle is of slight importance when compared with the effect which the intrusion upon the legislative province must inevitably work out.

I will not speak of the loss of dignity, of honor, and of power which this coordinate branch of the Government must suffer, for these are mere incidents of higher and nobler qualities and privileges. I do speak, however, and speak earnestly, of the loss of that sense of responsibility which can alone perpetuate free, representative government. I do not fear that in a single instance or during one administration the independent will of the Members of Congress can be overcome; but if upon subjects like the one before us, the practice of having bills prepared in the executive offices and presented to Congress for passage, accompanied with an implied message that punishment follows disobedience, is continued from year to year, in the end Congress will become a mere form in organized society.

With the utmost respect for the exalted office of President of the United States and for him who occupies it at the present time, I record my protest here and now against a practice which I believe to be full of danger and disaster.

Mr. President, with these preliminary observations, which I have felt impelled to make, I pass now to a consideration of the measure itself. Before I take it up specifically, I desire to say for it that it has much in it that is good; much in it that marks a real step forward in the regulation of our common carriers.

I am not moved by any spirit of antagonism to this bill, and I profoundly hope that those parts of it which are good will be preserved, but that those parts of it which mark a step backward in the effort which Congress has for twenty-three years been attempting in behalf of the people of the United States will be eliminated from it. I have said what I have said largely in order to secure from the Senate a fair and impartial hearing, unprejudiced, as I suggested a few moments ago, by the assumption that the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee, broad minded, loyal, patriotic, intelligent men as they are, have given to this bill in all its details and in all its particulars that consideration which committees ordinarily give to bills before they are reported.

The first six sections of the bill create a new court in the United States, to be called the United States court of commerce. These sections not only create the court and endow it with jurisdiction, prescribe for it a practice, but equip it with the usual and ordinary retinue of officers as well. It is a court to be composed of five circuit judges. They are, in the first instance, to be appointed by the President of the United States in the usual way. These are five new circuit judges, so that number is added to the present judicial force of the United States. The five men originally appointed constitute in the first instance the court of commerce. One of them is to remain a member of the court of commerce for five years, one of them for four years, one of them for three years, one of them for two years, and another for a single year. Then, as the term of service of each of these judges expires in this particular court, he retires to the general body of the circuit judges of the United States, and another is selected or designated by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court to take his place. Each of these judges has, during his service upon the court of commerce, an addition to the ordinary salary of a circuit judge of $3,000 per year. This, I assume, is to compensate these judges, who are to sit in the main in the city of Washington, for the high living, high prices, high rents, and high functions for which the city of Washington has become famous.

I object to the creation of an additional court of this character. I object to it, first, because it is unnecessary. If the present judicial force of the country is not sufficient to do the business of the country, then we ought to add to that judicial force directly; but although I believe it to be true that there are some parts of the land in which our circuit judges are fully occupied and have business enough to tax all their energies and consume all their time, there are other parts of the United States in which the office of district and circuit judge affords at least abundant opportunity for that leisure and recreation so necessary to the maintenance of happiness and good health.

I object to it because the cases over which it is to have jurisdiction have not been in the past, and will not be in the future, sufficient in number to warrant the institution of such a tribunal, and, in order that I may place this point squarely before Senators, I must be permitted to read from the bill that part of it which confers jurisdiction upon this new tribunal. It is to have jurisdiction over all cases of the following kinds:

First. All cases for the enforcement, otherwise than by adjudication and collection of a forfeiture or penalty or by infliction of criminal punishment, of any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission other than for the payment of money.

Second. Cases brought to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend in whole or in part any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Third. Such cases as by section 3 of the act to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States, approved February 19, 1903, are authorized to be maintained in a circuit court of the United States.

Fourth. All such mandamus proceedings as under the provisions of section 20 or section 23 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, are authorized to be maintained in a circuit court of the United States.

These are all the cases as at present known to the law over which this new court, composed of five circuit judges, is to have jurisdiction. I will remark a little later in my argument upon a new, novel, and extraordinary kind of lawsuits which are created by this bill, and concerning which this court is given jurisdiction; but as we have never had any such lawsuits in the United States, and I hope that we never will have any such lawsuits—for I can not conceive that the Senate will create a jurisdiction of that kind—I limit my argument at the present moment to the four classes of cases concerning which the present law speaks and of which our experience will tell us something of importance.

The Hepburn law, popularly so known, went into effect, as I remember, on the 30th of June, 1906. It has therefore been the law of the United States nearly four years. How many cases do you think have arisen under these four classes, comprising all the jurisdiction which the new court is to acquire—how many cases do you think have arisen during that time? I did not content myself with the conclusions that I might deduce from the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon this subject, but addressed myself, in order that I might be absolutely accurate, to the Interstate Commerce Commission itself, and I have in my hand a list of all the cases that have arisen in these four years under the four classes which I have just mentioned, and over which this new court will have jurisdiction, if it is created. These cases number 29 in all, and all of them, save one, arose under the second paragraph which I read to the Senate.

There are practically no cases since the Hepburn law went into effect brought by the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce its orders. The penalties attached to disobedience of the law are so severe that railway companies do not wait for the United States, or wait for shippers or persons interested, to bring suit for the enforcement of an order of the commission; but if the railways believe the commission is acting without authority, they institute suits to set aside, annul, restrain, or enjoin the order of the commission, and therefore it is exceedingly unlikely that in the future there will be suits arising under any of these paragraphs save the second one, and 28——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. And 28 out of the 29 cases begun in the last four years did arise under the second paragraph, which I have already read. I now yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, from the Senator's wide experience, I think he will be much more competent to express an opinion about the matter than I, and that is the reason I inquire as to this proposition. If this proposed law should be enacted, I understand from reading it that it will extend the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission so that upon its own initiative it will inquire into complaints and make orders affecting classification and orders of regulation of rates that are not the result of some specific complaint. As to whether that additional power would enlarge and increase the number of cases and the expense of litigation is a matter that came in my mind and upon which I should like to hear from the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I feel deeply obliged to the Senator from South Dakota for the suggestion he has just made. It is only fair in connection with this subject to consider—and I would have reached it, I think, in a moment—that this proposed law does enlarge the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission, does allow it to proceed in investigation of rates and classification upon its own motion. I can not believe, however, much as I approve that enlargement of power of the commission—and, indeed, I shall present to you, I hope, before I have finished persuasive and conclusive reasons for still further enlarging the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission—I can not believe that the number of orders that will be made by the commission under the new power, if you please, that we propose to grant to it will be greater than in the past, because the commission has industriously and energetically gone forward to the investigation and the decision of every case submitted to it, and the cases that have been submitted to it upon the complaint of some person or corporation or organization interested in the rates have consumed the entire time of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

This leads me to remark that if we are going to increase the officers of the United States, if we are to give anybody help in the administration of this law, it is the Interstate Commerce Commission which needs to be enlarged and strengthened rather than the courts. Therefore I answer the Senator from South Dakota by saying that, in my judgment, the number of cases brought in the future will not be greater than in the past, and, on the contrary, I believe that the number brought in the future will be fewer than the number brought in the past, and for this reason: Senators will all remember the famous debate which occurred in this Chamber in 1906 respecting the jurisdiction that ought to be given to a court to review the order or orders of the commission. There were some who were in favor of a broad, general power of review—in substance, the right to a retrial upon the merits of cases decided by the commission. Others were in favor of a narrower power of review that would limit the jurisdiction of the courts to the constitutional point. The language used in the act of 1906 was not so specific and certain as it might have been, and therefore for a period there was some difference of opinion with regard to the power of the courts over the orders of the commission.

But gradually that difference of opinion has disappeared, for finally a case reached the Supreme Court of the United States which involved a construction of the law in that respect. While possibly I shall refer to it again, I now call the attention of Senators to the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission v. Illinois Central Railroad Company, decided at the present session of the Supreme Court, in which the court prescribed the limits of power on the part of all the courts, and said, in substance, that the courts had this jurisdiction, and no other, over orders of the commission: First, to inquire whether the commission had proceeded in accordance with the law to obtain jurisdiction over the parties who were before it. Second, to ascertain whether the order entered was within the power conferred by the Congress of the United States. That is to say, whether the discretion which the commission had exercised, and which it was given the right to exercise, by this legislation, had been so abused, so disregarded, that there had been an invasion of the constitutional right of the common carrier to hold its property until it was taken from it by due process of law.

Therefore when these limits are understood, as they will be understood in the future, some of the cases which have been brought, if they were to be again brought by those who considered them, would, I am sure, never be instituted, and I think that this gradual narrowing of the power of the courts to interfere with the orders of the commission will much more than compensate for the additional cases in which orders may be entered by the commission in proceedings instituted upon its own motion.

Therefore I think it is fair, Senators, to assume that in the four years to come there will not be more than 28 or 29 cases brought over which the court of commerce, as organized in this bill, would have jurisdiction. That means something like seven or eight cases in a year. This court will impose upon the people of the United States an additional burden of not less than $100,000 per year. It may possibly be more, but not less than that sum. We ought not to add to our judicial force and impose this additional burden unless it is necessary, and there can not be a Senator here or an intelligent thinking man anywhere who will assert that it is necessary to establish a court composed of five eminent judges to dispose of seven or eight cases in a year.

I ask, Mr. President, that the reply of the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission, setting forth the number of cases which have been brought under these four paragraphs since June 30, 1906, be printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Iowa has stated, as I understand, that the Supreme Court has held that the power of the courts to review decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission was limited substantially to two questions; first, whether the Interstate Commerce Commission has proceeded within its jurisdiction, and second, whether or not the decision rendered by the Interstate Commerce Commission is confiscatory. Am I correct about that?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not stated with entire accuracy, Mr. President. In order to be absolutely precise and to advise the Senator from Utah in the very language of the Supreme Court, I beg to read the opinion of that tribunal upon the question just mentioned:

> Beyond controversy, in determining whether an order of the commission shall be suspended or set aside, we must consider, (a) all relevant questions of constitutional power or right; (b) all pertinent questions as to whether the administrative order is within the scope of the delegated authority under which it purports to have been made; and (c) a proposition which we state independently, although in its essence it may be contained in the previous one, viz, whether, even although the order be in form within the delegated power, nevertheless it must be treated as not embraced therein, because the exertion of authority which is questioned has been manifested in such an unreasonable manner as to cause it, in truth, to be within the elementary rule that the substance, and not the shadow, determines the validity of the exercise of the power. (Postal Telegraph Co. v. Adams, 155 U. S., 688, 698.) Plain as it is that the powers just stated are of the essence of judicial authority, and which, therefore, may not be curtailed, and whose discharge may not be by us in a proper case avoided, it is equally plain that such perennial powers lend no support whatever to the proposition that we may, under the guise of exerting judicial power, usurp merely administrative functions by setting aside a lawful administrative order upon our conception as to whether the administrative power has been wisely exercised.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is somewhat difficult to interpret the language of the Supreme Court from the simple reading of the decision, but, as I follow it, it seems to me I have substantially stated what the Supreme Court has held—that the jurisdiction is limited to these two questions. The question I wanted to ask the Senator from Iowa is this: He has given us a list of 29 cases that have arisen since the act of 1906; how many of those cases would fall within these classes—and these classes only—which the Supreme Court now holds to be within the jurisdiction of the court? Would all of them or only a part of them?

Mr. CUMMINS. While I do not profess to be familiar with every circumstance of these cases and all the detail of the testimony in them, I take it that a goodly proportion would fall within the rule stated by the Supreme Court; that is to say, would be dismissed upon the application of the rule just announced by the Supreme Court.

The members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, or some of them, as I understood the testimony of the chairman of the commission, believe that four or five possibly of these cases, of the 28—and there are but 28 of the kind you are now discussing—that four or five of these cases would plainly and obviously be so opposed to the rule announced by the Supreme Court that they would not have been brought, and that the other 23 or 24 would have been brought, even though the rule announced by the Supreme Court had been well recognized in the circuits at the time the suits were instituted. Did I correctly catch the import of the remarks of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Iowa has answered the question I propounded to him. As I understand, probably some twenty-three or twenty-four cases have arisen since the act of 1906 which would have come within the jurisdiction of the court of commerce if we had had such a court in the past.

Now, let me ask the Senator another question. Of course the length of time that a court may be occupied with litigation is not entirely determined by the number of cases. Can the Senator give us any idea as to the character of these cases, as to their importance, as to how long the court would naturally be occupied in considering the cases, because the Senator will agree with me, I think, that sometimes a court may be very busily occupied with half a dozen cases of a given character and would not be occupied any more busily with a hundred cases of an entirely different character.

Mr. CUMMINS. I recognize the discrimination which the Senator from Utah very justly makes, but fortunately I have provided myself for that contingency as well.

Not wholly content with the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, through its secretary, which I have just sent to the desk, I have been furnished another report which gives in detail the history of every case brought in the last four years—when the bill was filed, when the pleadings thereafter were filed, when the case was submitted, and when it was decided. I now ask to have printed as a part of my observations upon this subject the report of Mr. Edward A. Moseley, secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission, of all these cases. I will read one of them at hazard, that the Senator may see about how they are disposed of. I think it is true that more than one-half of all the cases of which I have spoken were determined upon demurrer or upon an agreed statement of facts, although I do not assert that the proposition I have just named is accurate, because I have not examined the record with regard to that point. But I will take a case which is well known.

I notice before me the case of A. B. Stickney and Charles H. F. Smith, receivers of the Chicago Great Western Railway Company et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission. This is known in the annals of the commission as the Chicago Live Stock Terminal Charge case. The bill was filed on the 8th day of May, 1908; the answer was filed on the 28th day of May, 1908; the brief was filed on the same day. It was argued and submitted on application for preliminary injunction on the same day. On the 30th day of June, a month and two days afterwards, an interlocutory decree granting a temporary injunction was issued. On the 16th of July it was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. On the 18th day of January of the year following, 1909, a motion to advance it under the statute was made. It was argued and submitted in October, 1909, and on the 29th day of November, 1909, the decision of the lower court was affirmed. I may say that this is a fair sample of these cases.

I desire to incorporate the paper in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa.

The paper referred to is as follows:

PROCEEDINGS IN COURT UNDER THE ELKINS ACT.

Circuit court of the United States for the northern division of the northern district of Illinois.

The United States of America v. The Chicago, Indianapolis and Louisville Railway Company (Monon Route): Bill under the Elkins Act to require the railroad company to desist from accepting advertising in payment for transportation; June 18, 1907, bill filed; May 11, 1908, answer filed; May 11, 1908, argued and submitted; July 15, 1908, injunction granted (163 Fed. Rep., 114); October 1, 1908, appeal to United States Supreme Court by Chicago, Indianapolis and Louisville Railway Company.

Mr. CUMMINS. I submit, therefore, that the creation of the proposed court of commerce is wholly unwarranted.

There is another suggestion made in the majority report, viz, that there has been much delay. I answer in the same fashion by the record. It is, secondly, said that there has been great contrariety of opinion, and therefore it is wise and essential that we secure in some way harmony and uniformity of decision by the institution of a new court. My reply is very much the same as that made by the historian who was writing a history of Iceland. He came to a point at which it was necessary to deal with the subject of snakes, and he devoted one chapter to that important topic, and it was headed "The snakes of Iceland." The chapter consisted of a single sentence, that ran like this: "There are no snakes in Iceland."

Just so with the suggestion of the delay and of the want of uniformity. I speak, of course, of serious differences of opinion that have affected the administration of the law. An examination of the papers I have already sent to the desk, and which will be incorporated in my observations, will demonstrate positively that the delay has not been in the circuit courts of the United States. The delay, in by far the greater number of the cases, aside from that delay which is incident to every lawsuit in which the attorneys must take large volumes of testimony, has been occasioned by the postponement of the submission in the Supreme Court of the United States, a postponement that can not be avoided, in view of the great volume of business which that exalted tribunal necessarily transacts.

I submit that the people of the United States have been well and efficiently served, so far as judicial decisions are concerned, by the law as it now is, and I protest against the creation of a new court, with its attendant expense, which can not be of any service to the people and can not add to the effectiveness of the administration of this law.

I have, moreover, another objection, which is more fundamental than the one I have just urged. I am opposed to the special court——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to ask the Senator, before he passes to another branch of the discussion, whether he can tell us if these cases have been increasing in number. The law has been in operation about four years. Can the Senator tell us, approximately, how many of these 28 or 29 cases arose during the first, the second, the third, and the fourth year, so that we may have an idea as to whether litigation of this class is increasing?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not recall the number of cases brought in each of these years. It is of course to be assumed that some time must have elapsed after the passage of the law of 1906 before there was an opportunity to bring such cases. But I believe it to be true that more than half of all these cases have been brought within the last year and a half, if that be the particular point in the mind of the Senator from Utah.

My objection just suggested is that it is unwise and impolitic to create a special tribunal for the trial of railway cases. It is just as important to the honor of the administration of the law in our country that the people shall have unbroken and unbounded confidence in the judgments of the court as it is that those judgments shall be right and true; and if you create a tribunal commissioned only for the trial of railway cases, selected as this tribunal originally is to be, and recruited as this tribunal is to be from time to time, I predict that, whether right or wrong, the people of this country will lose that unswerving and unfaltering faith which they have heretofore reposed in their judicial tribunals.

I do not know whether the tribunal will be disposed toward the railways or whether it will be disposed toward the commission and the people, but I do know that any judicial tribunal appointed or selected for the purpose only of adjusting or determining disputes between the great railway companies of the country and the people of the country will be subjected to that suspicion which naturally arises in the human heart. You can not subdue it; you can not overcome it.

Again, I am opposed to it because of the influences that will necessarily surround the selection of the judges. I agree that the President of the United States is as far removed from these influences as mortal man can be; I agree—or, at least, I hope—that every succeeding President will be so removed; I know that the honor and the integrity of the Supreme Court of the United States and its distinguished Chief Justice are without blemish; but when you remember that this tribunal is to weigh the fortunes of all the people of the United States in their controversies with railway companies; when you remember that the railway companies surround the Government of the United States in all its functions and in all its branches as perrasively as the atmosphere surrounds those who breathe it; when you remember that there are countless channels through which these great corporations exercise their power; I warn the Senate of the United States not to create a tribunal of this character, having jurisdiction only of a special, limited class of cases, upon the one side of which will always be the tremendous power of the railway corporations of the United States.

For these two reasons I believe that the commerce court ought not to be established. But if it is to be established, I believe we ought at least to reduce its number to three. Three judges can do all the judicial work that will be imposed upon this tribunal and still have much time for individual reflection and leisure. But I will not enlarge upon that phase of it, because it seems to assume that we are to have a commerce court, and I will not believe that we are to have it until a majority of the Senators have so decreed.

Next in the order of my discussion arises a question which concerns the jurisdiction of the commerce court.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Do I understand that the Senator has submitted an amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes, sir; I will, as I pass through, submit amendments.

There is a question, Mr. President, with regard to the jurisdiction which is to be conferred upon the court of commerce. I recall you again to the great argument of four years ago—the great debate between the broad review and the narrow review, and it is an important and material inquiry—whether this bill enlarges the power of the commerce court with respect to the classes of cases over which it is to have judicial power.

I do not, as a lawyer, assert that the bill as it is now before the Senate does confer any greater power over the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission than the circuit courts now possess. But there are lawyers, and good lawyers, who believe that it does.

If I may be permitted, I want to do the Attorney-General, who is the author of this bill, the justice of saying that when this was called to his attention, while he said that it was not his purpose to give greater jurisdiction to the court of commerce than the circuit courts now have, yet in order to remove the doubt which had been suggested by a lawyer who appeared before the committee, and suggested also by the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, he was quite willing and glad to interpose an amendment that would put that subject beyond any dispute whatsoever; and thereupon he wrote into the bill an amendment or proposed amendment which declared in unequivocal, unmistakable terms that the jurisdiction of the commerce court over the orders of the commission was not to be greater, other, or different than the jurisdiction now exercised by the circuit courts.

The chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission had before that time in the open hearings of the committee submitted just such an amendment. For reasons which it is not necessary for me now to state, the Attorney-General withdrew this amendment, and it does not appear in the bill before the Senate. It does appear in one of the reprints of the committee which I have before me. It does appear in the last bill introduced in the House of Representatives, and it is there now under consideration by the committee of the House; but it is not here.

I can not think that factional passion has run so wild, has become so ungovernable, that after the question has been raised by eminent men and after the doubt has been set afloat with regard to the proper construction of this bill, the Senate will decline to make it as certain and specific as the mother tongue can make it.

The only reason for keeping it out is to nourish, encourage, and possibly realize the hope that there is in this bill language which will give the court the power to practically retry cases that have been decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in this insidious and circuitous way accomplish what all the power of the railroads exerted in 1906 was unable to accomplish.

So, Senators, I pass from this part of the bill, and I now send to the desk an amendment, which I will propose at the proper time, and which I ask to have printed and laid upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have it read?

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to have it read.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I may have misunderstood him. Do I understand the Senator to say that while this bill was pending in Congress, an amendment was written by an officer of the Government, not a Member of Congress, and that upon his motion it was engrafted upon the bill, and subsequent to that time, upon his motion, it was stricken from the bill? I thought the matter of amendment as well as the original introduction of a bill was exclusively for Congress. Did I understand the Senator correctly?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, no; not with exactitude. The Senator possibly was not here in the earlier part of my remarks. I was attempting to give the history of this bill as it passed through the committee. I spoke a moment ago of amendments in the committee, not in Congress. I repeat, if it be proper for me to do it, that this bill while pending before the committee was rewritten at least three times by the Attorney-General, and the committee printed from time to time the revisions of the Attorney-General. In one of those revisions there occurred the provision to which I have just referred, but afterwards, for some reason satisfactory to himself, in making the final revision which was reported by the committee in the manner I have attempted to describe heretofore, that particular provision was omitted.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I do not think I misunderstood the Senator. I possibly was not felicitous in attempting to suggest to him what my understanding was. Of course I do not wish to interrupt the Senator in the line of his argument; I simply wish to know if I correctly understood the Senator. Of course the work in committee is a part of the work of the Senate. I wish to know if I correctly understood the Senator that the Attorney-General, while the bill was in committee, wrote into the bill amendments, and then upon his motion took them out of the bill, and that the committee reported the bill in the shape in which he thus changed it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, of course the Attorney-General did not amend the bill. He could not amend the bill in the strict and accurate sense of those words. What I said was that he rewrote the bill from time to time and there seemed to be no question in the committee that whatever he incorporated in it should be accepted by the committee and it was hoped, I think, by the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I do not think I misunderstand the Senator. In other words, the committee was plastic in the hands of the Attorney-General and the bill was equally plastic, and he molded it as he saw fit and put on it anything he saw fit; and the committee accepted it and took it off whenever he saw fit, the committee being equally acquiescent.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator has caught the idea.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment sent to the desk by the Senator from Iowa.

The SECRETARY. Amendment to be offered to Senate bill 6737 by Mr. CUMMINS:

Strike out of the title of the bill in the first line thereof the following words: "Create a court of commerce and to."

Strike out, beginning with the word "that," in line 3, page 1, to and including the word "transfer," in line 5, page 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I did not exactly catch the Senator's idea just now. Do I understand the Senator to say that the bill as reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce as it now appears, the bill which has a favorable report and which we are discussing, there is no provision confining the court to the question as to whether or not the rate fixed by the commission was a reasonable and a just one. As I understand the act which we passed in 1906, it was intended to be a narrow or a restricted review, and the only question left for the court to decide is whether or not the rate fixed was a confiscatory rate, that is, a rate in violation of the Constitution of the United States. Now, the Supreme Court has construed the act of 1906.

Do I understand the Senator to say that this bill, which he is discussing on a favorable report from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, is intended to enlarge the jurisdiction of the court in regard to the question of review and to enable the court to determine the whole question to retry the case, or whether the bill will simply confine the new court to the question involved whether it is a reasonable and just rate as provided by the Constitution?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Attorney-General, who drew this bill, said that it was not his intent to enlarge the jurisdiction of the court over the orders of the commission and as I stated a few moments ago, I do not assert that it does. On the contrary, if I were deciding the matter as a judge, if I were interpreting the law as it came from the hands of the Attorney-General, I would be compelled to hold that it does not. I say this in order to be absolutely frank and candid.

But the very moment the bill became public, those who were interested in the subject-matter and who came before the committee upon the days of its open hearings expressed the belief that it did enlarge the powers of the court over the orders of the commission, and practically empowered or authorized the court of commerce to retry on the merits the cases that had been decided by the commission.

The chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, fully imbued with that fear and that opinion, came before the committee, and, expressing his apprehension in that regard, suggested an amendment that I may well read to you in order that it may be clear.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. FLINT. May I ask the Senator what is the particular language in the bill that the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission thought would give this increased jurisdiction?

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not cross-examine the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon that point. It seemed to me so clear that when any intelligent and reasonable man felt a doubt, the doubt should be removed, that I did not go analytically into his interpretation of the bill. But this is what he said before the committee:

> Second, assuming, as we do, that it is so intended—

He was speaking for the Interstate Commerce Commission—> and to remove any doubt that may hereafter arise, we strongly recommend that the bill be so amended as to contain the explicit statement that the commerce court shall have no jurisdiction or power over orders of the commission not now possessed by circuit courts of the United States, as defined and limited by the Supreme Court in the car distribution cases, so called—

That is, the case against the Illinois Central Railroad—> which was recently decided.

His suggestion as to amendment was to insert:

> But nothing in this act contained shall be construed to give the court of commerce in such cases any jurisdiction or authority not now possessed by circuit courts of the United States or the judges thereof.

Thereupon the Attorney-General, having been advised, I assume, of these suggestions, wrote into the bill, or proposed to the committee, and it was so printed by the committee, this paragraph:

> But nothing hereinbefore contained shall be construed as enlarging the jurisdiction now possessed by the circuit courts of the United States or the judges thereof, which is hereby transferred to and invested in the court of commerce.

That provision is in the bill as it was introduced in the House of Representatives, coming, I assume, from the same source. But when a distinguished and influential member of the Interstate Commerce Committee suggested that there ought to be no such limitation, no removal of the doubt, the Attorney-General then in his last revision omitted the clause, and it is not in the bill now before the Senate as reported by the Interstate Commerce Committee. So if the bill passes in its present form, in the future when men come to discuss, to debate, to interpret this law, they will refer, as they will have a right to refer, to its history as it passed through Congress, and then it may well be held that Congress intended to confer additional power upon the court of commerce and to give it the authority to practically retry the cases decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the Senator will permit me right in this connection, I should like to hear the Senator's amendment read in connection with what he has just said. The proposed amendment goes to that point, does it not?

Mr. CUMMINS. The amendment that has been read does not go to that point.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Very well; I did not notice it carefully, but I thought that was the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was about to return to the point from which I digressed. The amendment that has just been read strikes out all the provisions of the bill creating the United States court of commerce, and leaves this law, so far as the trial of cases brought to suspend and set aside or annul the orders of the commission, precisely as it now is. It strikes out of the title all reference to the court, and then strikes out the first six sections of the bill, which create the court and equip it with officers and endow it with jurisdiction. But I will come to the amendment in a moment to which the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] refers.

I propose a further amendment. I do not ask that it shall be read, but I ask that it shall be printed and lie on the table, to be offered hereafter to the bill. By this amendment it is intended, if the evil fate overtakes us and this court is established, that its number shall be reduced to three, so that we may have as little burden as possible by the way of increased expenditures.

The amendment was ordered to be printed and to lie on the table, as follows:

> Strike out of line 24, page 2, the word "five" and insert "three."
> Strike out of line 2, page 3, the word "five" and insert "three."
> Strike out of line 4, page 3, the word "five" and insert "three."
> Strike out of line 6, page 3, the comma after the word "three;" also strike out the word "four" with the comma after the same and the words "and five," and insert the word "and" after the word "two."
> In line 1, page 4, strike out the word "five" and insert the word "three."
> Strike out of line 13, page 4, the word "four" and insert the word "two."

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, Mr. President, I come to the point just made.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I do not want to interrupt the Senator's course of discussion, but before leaving the commerce court let me ask him if it is his purpose to discuss the jurisdiction of that court under section 12 before he concludes?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; before I finish my address I shall hope to give some attention to that subject. However, I expect to go through the bill in regular order, and I will direct my argument to that subject as soon as it is reached.

Recurring now to the question just suggested by the Senator from South Dakota, I have to say that I have already read the amendment that was proposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission in respect to the jurisdiction of the new court. I have read the amendment that was actually written into the bill, as suggested by the Attorney-General; and I now send to the desk an amendment proposed by the minority of the committee, composed of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] and myself, upon the same subject, and ask that it be read, printed, and lie on the table, to be hereafter offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

> Strike out line 6, page 1, and substitute the following therefor:
> "Have exclusive original jurisdiction over all cases of the following kinds, but no other different or greater jurisdiction with respect thereto than is now possessed and exercised under existing law by the circuit courts of the United States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is, in substance, the amendment of the Attorney-General.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no difference whatever, except that it does not follow his exact language.

Mr. President, I pass now from the commerce court to examine what I believe to be the most serious and disastrous blow dealt to the shippers of the country found in the bill. It also is in the first six sections, and before I state precisely what it is proposed to do, I hope the Senate will pardon me while I state the law as it is now.

At the present time if any railroad company desires to set aside, annul, restrain, and enjoin the order of the commission it brings its suit in a circuit court of the United States and makes the Interstate Commerce Commission the party defendant, and the Interstate Commerce Commission defends its own order. It defends the suit; and the almost universal practice of the commission is to call to its assistance the attorneys who have appeared for the complainant or the complainants in the proceedings before the commission, who have demonstrated their knowledge of the case and their capacity to manage and conduct it by having secured from the commission a favorable result.

What does this bill propose? It proposes not only that all such suits shall be brought in the new court of commerce, but that they shall be brought against the United States eo nomine; that the notice shall be served not only upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, but upon the Department of Justice, and that the Department of Justice alone is entitled to appear in any such suit for defense. The Interstate Commerce Commission is not only impliedly but expressly forbidden to take any part or interest in the succeeding litigation.

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ELKINS. Do I understand the Senator to say that the universal rule or custom is to employ complainant's counsel or the counsel of shippers before the commission in the trial of complaints as to unreasonable rates and charges?

Mr. CUMMINS. I said "almost universal."

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator allow me merely to have read the precise facts upon that subject from the Interstate Commerce Commission, which will fully answer the Senator?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to the reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, March 15, 1910.

Hon. S. B. ELKINS,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your communication of the 14th instant, I write to say:

An examination of cases instituted in court to enjoin enforcement of the commission's orders shows that in 4 of the 31 cases the commission employed attorneys who had represented complainants in the proceedings before the commission; in 8 other cases complainants, in proceedings before the commission, were represented in the trial of the cases before the courts, but without compensation by the commission; and in the remainder of the cases the litigation has been conducted exclusively by the attorneys for the commission.

Yours, very truly,

MARTIN A. KNAPP, Chairman.

Mr. ELKINS. I have had this communication read in order to set the Senator from Iowa right, because I do not think he would want to make a statement not sustained by the facts.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa does not need to be set right with regard to that statement. There is nothing inconsistent between the statement just read and the statement I made. I know personally with regard to all the cases that have been tried by the Interstate Commerce Commission from our part of the country that whether the attorneys for the complainants have nominally appeared or not they always—I do not know of an exception—lend their aid and give their assistance to the Interstate Commerce Commission in the trial of the cases.

But the point I make is not with regard to the appearance formally of the complainant or complainants at the present time, because that is simply by the pleasure of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The objection I have to this bill is the substitution of the Department of Justice for the Interstate Commerce Commission. I warn you that whenever you transfer this power and this responsibility from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Department of Justice you will have destroyed in large measure the effectiveness of the law. In so saying I am not impeaching either the competency or the honesty of the Department of Justice, for I assume that it will always prosecute or defend according to its judgment and its conscience, and with the ability which men appointed to such positions ought to possess.

My objection is that, in the first place, the Department of Justice will be given an irresponsible and unappealable review upon the orders of the commission. Imagine, if you please, the Interstate Commerce Commission entering an order affecting the rights of that vast territory in the West, because it is of that territory I know most. These controversies are now disputes between localities. My friend the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], who has joined me in this minority report, at the present time is or ought to be as a citizen interested in proceedings that affect his State. I, as a Senator from Iowa, am interested in proceedings that affect my State. At this moment there is in progress before the Interstate Commerce Commission a suit or proceeding which involves the right of St. Paul, of Sioux City, of Omaha, of Kansas City, and of other shipping points adjacent to the Missouri River. The Interstate Commerce Commission will one of these days enter its order, and if it awards the relief that is sought by the men who are in business in the State from which I come, then it will force the railroads to bring their suit in the court of commerce to enjoin that order. Then it all passes over to the Department of Justice, and it will be for the Attorney-General, in the first instance, to examine the case and ascertain whether, in his judgment, the Interstate Commerce Commission acted wisely, acted appropriately, and did justice to the people of my State or injustice to the people of Minnesota.

I am amazed that it is proposed by any reflecting person that a review of that kind shall be permitted in the administration of a law of this character. The Interstate Commerce Commission is but a committee of Congress. It has no judicial functions whatever that are not exercised day after day by the committees of Congress. Would you permit some other department of the Government, would you permit the Attorney-General to say whether an act of Congress—because that is what an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission is—to say whether an act of Congress shall be defended or not defended? I can imagine, if Minnesota were represented by some other Senator less patriotic and less impartial, what would occur in the Attorney-General's office when the suit to which I have just referred should come within the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice. Minnesota would be compelled to try her case with Iowa in the first instance in the office of the Attorney-General if he believed—and I am not imputing to him any disposition to do aught but his duty—but if he believed that Minnesota was right and Iowa was wrong, then he would not defend and could not in conscience defend the suit that had been brought to set aside the order which had been entered by the commission.

The Senate spent months four years ago in determining the character of the review which should be permitted by the courts, and yet by a single stroke of the pen in this bill it is proposed to convert the Department of Justice into a court of review without publicity, without appeal, without redress of any sort whatsoever. The proposition is shocking to me, and I believe will be repelled by the great majority of the people whose fortunes are involved in the correct, effective, and adequate administration of this law.

But that is not all. Here is a case brought before the Interstate Commerce Commission, with its great detail of evidence and volumes of rate sheets and of business and transportation conditions. It finally reaches an end in an order of the commission. The commission is thoroughly familiar with the case, because it has taken every step from the beginning to the end of it. Then comes the suit in the court of commerce by the railway company affected by the order, and instantly the whole forum changes. The Attorney-General is to defend the case. He knows nothing about it. It is impossible for him to become as familiar with it as those who have been in at the beginning and who have pursued it step after step. The attorneys for the railway company have collected this testimony; they have brought it together for the purpose of arguing the case before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and they are with the case in the court as well as before the commission.

But not one person who is either financially interested in the outcome or one person who has any familiarity with the proceedings is allowed to take any part in its after conduct. What chance——

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ELKINS. This becomes a case against the United States, as the Senator has properly stated, after the case goes up from the Interstate Commerce Commission. Would the Senator have all of the shippers who are interested in the determination of that case represented by their counsel, or would he have it intrusted to the Attorney-General, who has charge of the interests of the United States and of all the people? That is the question I should like to put to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, you might just as well say that the Attorney-General should defend every suit brought upon a promissory note, because all the people are interested in the administration of justice, as to say that he ought to defend these cases from the standpoint which the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] has just suggested. So far as I am concerned, my attitude is perfectly well known and will be disclosed in the amendment that I shall presently send to the desk, namely, that all the complainants, whether there be one or whether there be a dozen, before the Interstate Commerce Commission who have been given the relief for which they have prayed, shall not only be permitted to appear by courtesy, but shall be given the unquestioned and absolute right to appear before the court of commerce. I care nothing about the suggestion that there might be complexity in the parties; I care nothing about the differences of opinion that there might be among counsel. It is a false view of the whole subject to say that the United States alone as a sovereignty is interested in these proceedings. I recur to the case that I have just mentioned, because it fully illustrates such difficulties. These men are now prosecuting their case before the Interstate Commerce Commission. Every dollar they have is involved in the outcome of that controversy, because if the rates which are now enforced are continued, every one of them will be driven from the business in which he is engaged.

Do you tell me if they succeed in convincing the Interstate Commerce Commission that they are entitled to relief and that the rates which burden them so that they can not continue the vocations which they have chosen are wrong; that their rights are to be turned over to the United States, to the Attorney-General, to be viewed by him in the cold aspect of abstraction, which takes into account universal justice? I marvel that any man who has at heart the welfare of the people can contemplate with complacency any such procedure or such jurisdiction.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ELKINS. I think that the position of the Senator would introduce intolerable confusion in the administration of this proposed law if he is sustained and his amendment should be adopted. There might be 100 or 200 or 300 shippers claiming the right to intervene, each with his lawyer, or with four or five lawyers on each side. Here is a case against the United States, which the Attorney-General under his oath of office must defend, and by this act he is required to do it. How will they settle and determine their differences before they go into court?

The Attorney-General of the United States appears for all the people, not only for those who may have an immediate interest, but for all the people of the United States. Suppose the shippers so conduct their case that a judgment is rendered wrongly. The Attorney-General of the United States in that instance would not be heard. He would, according to the Senator's statement, or his amendment, have to let the shipper control the conduct of the case. One stands for himself or for one body of shippers, while the Attorney-General of the United States stands for all the people and all the shippers.

We have to lodge power somewhere in the administration of law, and it is the Attorney-General of the United States, with his assistants, who should have that power. The United States is paying all the expenses of this litigation. The Attorney-General is empowered to employ assistant counsel. It is presumed that he will consult the counsel who had theretofore conducted the litigation. As it is now, in fact, the responsibility is divided. As I have said, we have to trust somebody, and who can we trust better before the courts of the United States than the Attorney-General, with his staff of assistants? What motive, what wrong can be imputed to him in the administration of his high office?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the best lawyer in the world was never able to appear for the plaintiff and the defendant at the same time.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, in the Interstate Commerce Commission the lawyers appear for the complainant and the defendant nearly all the time, except in the few cases to which the Senator referred a while ago. The Senator must be right as to the facts in this argument. When the Senator said it was the universal custom, or words to that effect, to employ counsel of complainants in the trial of cases I showed that the Government appeared for everybody before the commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the statement——

Mr. ELKINS. It is not a case of shippers. It becomes a case of the United States, and the United States should be trusted to take care of any particular body of its citizens, two or three or even five hundred of them, when it has to take care of the interests of all the people. You now intrust everything to the Attorney-General affecting the great questions that are before the courts, and why not trust him in respect to a few shippers who make complaints?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. Why not allow the commission, whose order is involved and whose order is attacked, to defend it in their way?

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, the change sought to be brought about by this bill is to relieve the commission from the position, in which it has been for years, of being prosecutor, judge, investigator, and defender. This bill puts the cases before the United States courts in proper order. The commission investigates a case, reaches its conclusion, and an appeal is taken. Why should the commission be the investigator in a case, the prosecutor, the grand jury, and, finally, the judge? Now, not satisfied, the Senator from Texas wants to send them up to the courts of the United States there to keep on making their case good.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, that sounds a little familiar to those of us who have borne some little part in this effort to regulate railroads. That was the old argument they made against all commissions, and whatever force there was in it at any time was in the original process; but after the commission has made an order and its order is attacked, I think nobody in this world could be more safely trusted to defend that order and employ suitable counsel than the commission itself.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me ask the Senator one question?

Mr. BAILEY. I am trespassing on the time of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ELKINS. The commission can not itself appear in court?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not think they ought to appear, because they all are not lawyers——

Mr. ELKINS. No; they can not appear.

Mr. BAILEY. Therefore you would not want them to do so.

Mr. ELKINS. I want to ask the Senator, who is a good lawyer and familiar with practice, why can not the commission trust the Attorney-General of the United States?

Mr. BAILEY. The trouble with that is that the Attorney-General has a thousand other things to do, and if he is equally zealous in the performance of his multitude of duties, some of them would fail to receive the proper attention.

Mr. ELKINS. Under the bill we give him the power to employ counsel.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to say that I make no concealment of my objection. I object to it simply because it involves the whole railroad commission and its work in every presidential election. The railroads would be more interested in the Attorney-Generalship of the United States than they would be in the presidency itself. That is my whole objection to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator has anticipated an objection that I had intended to urge and which is set out in the minority report.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit me just for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In order to clear up a point which I do not quite understand, I wish to ask, Is it the intention of the Senator, if his idea prevails in the framing of the law, that, instead of substituting the United States as a party, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall remain the party and shall control the selection of an attorney to conduct the proceedings in court? I supposed that was the case; but I am now confused, because apparently this proposition comes in, as suggested by the Senator from Texas, that after the party in interest—that is, the shipper who was interested in securing the making of an order and who was represented by attorneys, or different groups of shippers who may have been so represented—shall have been successful and the commission shall have made the order, when it comes under review in court, not simply the commission shall control these proceedings and select the attorney, but the shipper or the groups of shippers, who may have different counsel, shall also have a voice in the proceeding. If so, then the question arises whether or not too many cooks may not spoil the broth, and who is really to control the proceedings.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that suggestion was made by me, and not by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. I made no suggestion of that kind, although I have no hesitation in saying that if the parties who prosecuted the complaint below chose to follow it to the courts after the commission had decided it, I would not deny them that privilege. There would be no trouble about the multitude of counsel, because the court can always limit the number of counsel whom it will hear. The Interstate Commerce Commission must control; and I would give them the best lawyer in the United States who could be induced to accept an appointment as their attorney.

Mr. ELKINS. That would be the Attorney-General, who is already paid.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, the Attorney-General has much else to do.

Mr. ELKINS. But he can employ all the counsel he wants, under this bill.

Mr. BAILEY. But, Mr. President, it is not the number; it is the kind that is wanted.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Texas one further question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ELKINS. Suppose a thousand people are interested in a given question or in a certain complaint, and each one of those, or each group of 100, wants separate counsel.

Mr. BAILEY. The court would determine whom it would hear.

Mr. ELKINS. How are you going to put upon the court the task of dictating to the shippers what counsel they shall employ?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will answer that question presently to the Senator's entire satisfaction.

Mr. ELKINS. There would be two sets of lawyers, where one would do. I trust the Senator from Texas as much as I do the Senator from Iowa to answer these questions. Both are very able lawyers.

Mr. CUMMINS. This is not a legal question, however.

Mr. ELKINS. I know it is not, but it pertains to the court.

Mr. BAILEY. A man who is not a lawyer could decide this just as well.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not believe he could.

Mr. BAILEY. But I want to say to the Senator from West Virginia, with the permission of the Senator from Iowa, that there is never any trouble about a question of that kind. If the counsel do not agree among themselves, the court itself would decide it. There is a great case pending in a great tribunal now not very far from where we sit, and probably there are 40 lawyers, first and last, connected with it; but I imagine there will not be more than two or three on each side, and the court will probably limit them as to the time.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is another question, aside from the personality of counsel, I think, involved. There might be an entire disagreement as to the policy to be pursued by different groups of shippers. Would the court determine what policy should be pursued?

Mr. BAILEY. Undoubtedly the commission itself would determine that, and the attorney for every dissatisfied shipper or complainant would be in the attitude of an assistant counsel, and he could confer with his colleagues. The commission now employs its counsel, and the counsel of the shippers, as I happen to know, frequently confer with the counsel of the commission, both in the preparation of cases and as to the line of argument which shall be pursued. They come together in conference and eliminate whatever may be irrelevant and immaterial, and they reach the heart of the question in that way.

Now, according to my view—and I am sure that is the view of the Senator from Iowa—the commission would control, and all the help that the shippers would offer the commission in the way of competent legal assistance, I imagine the commission would welcome; and I am sure if they had the right kind of a lawyer to represent them he would welcome it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, answering the last suggestion of the Senator from Texas and in order that there may be no misunderstanding with regard to my position, I say that if the defense in these cases be retained with the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has an interest to defend the order it has entered, then there is no such necessity for enlarging the opportunity that counsel for shippers now have to enter the case and directly control it, but if the case is to be transferred to the Department of Justice, then I shall insist that those who are interested in the proceeding financially or legally shall have the absolute right to appear and present their rights under the law.

And that brings me to answer the Senator from West Virginia. I do not believe he has correctly apprehended my objection to this change. If the Interstate Commerce Commission were looking for a lawyer to defend its action, I can imagine no more happy or fortunate choice than the Attorney-General of the United States, for the Attorney-General of the United States would then be the counsel for the Interstate Commerce Commission and would carry on its purposes and defend its actions or rights precisely as he would defend any other client, but under this law the Interstate Commerce Commission does not go to the Attorney-General for the purpose of having its action defended. The suit is not to be brought against the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is to be brought against the United States, and the Interstate Commerce Commission has no control whatsoever over it. If the Attorney-General is courteous enough to ask of the Interstate Commerce Commission concerning its merits, well and good, but there need be no communication whatsoever, so far as the proposed law is concerned, between the office of the Attorney-General and the office of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would like to ask a question. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was about to ask whether the Senator from Idaho could defer the question he wishes to propose. I was going to suggest that it is obvious to me that I can not conclude all I have to say within the time that Senators would be willing to remain this afternoon, and therefore, if it meets the pleasure of the Senate, I would be very glad to have the further consideration of the bill postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would be glad, if the Senator will permit me, to submit the question now, and then it can be considered. If the shipper is the winning party before the commission, then the Attorney-General becomes the attorney on appeal for the railroad company?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the Attorney-General, if he saw fit to do it, would become the attorney for the shipper.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would depend on how the decision below went.

Mr. CUMMINS. As the Senator from Idaho will remember, the law does not provide for any review of the order of the commission at the suggestion of a complainant; that is, at the suggestion of a shipper. The railroads alone have a right to appeal to the court.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the principle which attracted my attention.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is just on this point: Is it a fact that when a shipper or a group of shippers make a complaint before the commission, have a hearing, and against whom an adverse decision runs, the decision being in the favor of the carrier, the decision is final as to the shipper, and that in that case no review whatever is allowed?

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe that to be true.

Mr. HEYBURN. But if the decision is against the railroad company, from that time on it has no occasion to employ counsel or incur any expense whatever, the Attorney-General defending the decision below?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Idaho does not see the exact relation. If the order entered by the commission is against the railroad company, then the railroad company brings suit to set aside or annul the order.

Mr. HEYBURN. And the Attorney-General represents it?

Mr. CUMMINS. And the Attorney-General, according to this bill, may appear and defend the order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, just reverse that condition, and for whom would the Attorney-General appear?

Mr. CUMMINS. He would never have an opportunity to appear for anybody, because there is no appeal to the courts on the part of the shipper.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

[At this point Mr. CUMMINS yielded the floor for the day.]

Wednesday, March 16, 1910.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, during the time yesterday that I gave consideration to the proposal to transfer from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Department of Justice the defense of suits brought to set aside, annul, or restrain orders entered by the commission there was so much general debate arising out of interruptions, and very proper interruptions, that the continuity of the observations I was endeavoring to make was somewhat lost. In view of the importance of the proposal I beg the privilege of restating the question and my objection to it.

It will be understood that at the present time all suits brought to annul the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission are brought in the circuit courts of the United States, and they are defended by the commission. The proposition contained in this bill is to require all such suits to be brought against the United States and defended, if defended at all, by the Department of Justice. I repeat what I said yesterday with regard to this suggestion. In my opinion it will do more to destroy the efficiency of the interstate commerce law, the administration of the law, than any other adverse proposal contained in this bill.

I intend to take up the history of a case, an actual case, although I might well propose it as a supposititious case, in order that the Senate may understand just what is proposed and just why it is proposed. Not long ago the Corn Belt Meat Producers' Association of Iowa, an association composed of thousands of our hog raisers and cattle raisers, brought before the Interstate Commerce Commission a proceeding complaining of the rate from Iowa points to Chicago upon live hogs. I do not see before me the distinguished chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, who has this bill in charge. I do not know whether he is at all interested in the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I will simply say that I understand the chairman of the committee was called out for a moment. He will be back in a very short time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt that some imperative summons has taken him from the Chamber. Otherwise he would be here. I intend, I may say in parenthesis, to speak somewhat slowly until the members of the Senate have been able to satisfy an appetite which is natural to man. I understand perfectly that at this particular time they are gratifying other senses than those employed in hearing speeches.

The Senator from West Virginia remarked yesterday that there would be infinite difficulty if the shippers were permitted to intervene or to appear in the suits brought in the commerce court. I hope some friend of this bill, if it has any friends, will convey to him when he returns to the Chamber what I am about to say. These thousands of shippers, united under an association known as the Corn Belt Meat Producers' Association, appeared by a single attorney. There was no difficulty there; no confusion there. This single attorney was aided by the attorney-general of the State of Iowa under a wise provision of the statutes of that State. Together they conducted this proceeding against the railroads which carry hogs from Iowa to the eastern market. The complaint was that the rates as compared with the rates from other producing fields were too high and ought to be reduced. Vast volumes of testimony were taken in the hearing before the commission. Finally, and within a few days, the commission entered an order condemning these rates and prescribing for the future reduced rates from Iowa points, or certain Iowa points, upon this product.

I do not know whether the railways interested in that proceeding will attempt to set aside, annul, or enjoin this order of the commission or not. I believe the time in which a bill of that character may be filed has not yet expired. But I will assume that under the present law the railways interested do file such a bill, and do seek the injunction which is provided for in the practice of the courts as well as in the law itself. The Interstate Commerce Commission will appear and defend; it will defend with a motive; it will defend with an earnest purpose to succeed. Why? Because it has already been convinced of the injustice of the rates against which complaint was made, and it has reached the conclusion that they ought to be changed. No matter whether the commission in conformity to its general practice advises with the attorneys who appeared before it for the complainants or not, we will have a real lawsuit, a lawsuit defended by men who have the highest motive to defend it, defended by men who believe that the order assailed is right; and therefore they will bring to the defense all the facts and all the arguments which the circumstances of the case provide in order to sustain the reduction already ordered.

Now, let us assume that this law has passed, and let us point out the consequences under its operation. Instead of bringing a suit against the Interstate Commerce Commission the railways will bring a suit against the United States by name, and the service of the notice will be made upon the Department of Justice. Then what will the Department of Justice do? Mark you, these humble citizens of Iowa are engaged in raising hogs. I hope that is not to their discredit, because we have this advantage—at least in my State—we only raise hogs of the four-legged variety. There are some States not so well situated in that respect, although those States shall be nameless at the present moment. But these humble citizens of the Republic brought their case, and they won it, before the Interstate Commerce Commission. They convinced that body of men, created by Congress for the very purpose of investigating these rates, that they had been unjustly dealt with by the railway companies.

Now, what must they do when this case is brought against the United States? They must convince the Department of Justice that the order of the commission was right, and ought to be defended and vindicated. They must enter into some sort of an extrajudicial and political inquiry before the Department of Justice, in order to make the officer who occupies that high place believe that this order is one that should be sustained. If I may be permitted to use a somewhat unclassical phrase, here is "the nigger in the wood pile." Here is the milk in the cocoanut.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who, though often wrong—I was about to say nearly always wrong—is never obscure, took the mask off this provision of the law yesterday, or, rather, helped me to do it, when he stated in response to some suggestion, made either by myself or some other Senator, that the reason why the defense of these cases is to be transferred from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Department of Justice is that the Department of Justice might consider the question from the high standpoint of public policy; that there might be policies involved in the defense of these suits; and that, therefore, they wanted their defense intrusted to a department that looked not to the decision that had been made by the commission, but to the general welfare of all the people of the United States.

Tell me, if you will, what judgment the farmers who are interested in the case that I have put will enter upon a proposal to take the defense of the case from the Interstate Commerce Commission, that it has already convinced of its righteousness, and transfer it to the Department of Justice, which is to consider it from some vague, intangible point of view that may result in a defense and may result in an abandonment.

I can not think that the full enormity of this proposal has yet dawned upon the Senator responsible for this bill, or else the suggestion would be speedily withdrawn. What will the Attorney-General consider? He will consider whether the rates that have been condemned by the commission, rates which either add to or take away from the profits of the producers of Iowa, is on the whole good for the entire country.

Does the Senator from West Virginia believe that a lawsuit instituted to protect rights, instituted to protect property of that sort, should be at that stage transferred to a tribunal from which there is no appeal, over which there is no review, and in which the judgment of the commission may be either set aside or abandoned, not for reasons stated in any opinion, but for reasons, as suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island, of high, broad, public policy?

If the Senator from West Virginia lived in our part of the country he would know I am speaking the truth about this. He used to live out in that direction. I do not know why he ever left that God's country, but if he lived out there he would know that the present difficulty in rate making does not relate so much to the actual rate charged by the railway companies as it does to the relative rates imposed upon various commodities and for various communities. Our struggle out there is one of competition between communities, localities, each of them wanting to get its product into the market at a fair rate as compared with a similar product of some other community with which it must compete. That is the great question of the West.

Now, the Iowa farmers have just had it decided that the Iowa rate on hogs is too high as compared with the rate on the same animals from other parts of the country, and if the Senator from West Virginia indorses this bill, of which I have the gravest doubt, and concerning which I have not yet heard him speak——

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Pardon me just a moment, and then I will yield.

If he does, then does he propose that the question whether Iowa is being fairly dealt with in regard to the rates on hogs, as compared with Nebraska, and with Kansas, and with Missouri, and with South Dakota, and North Dakota, and Minnesota, shall be taken up by the Attorney-General and be by him decided in the secrecy of his chamber, without any opportunity, so far as the law provides, for any man interested in the outcome to be heard or to lay before him either the evidence or the arguments? Now, I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not see the difference between the Attorney-General appearing in these cases and appearing in any other cases against the United States. Certainly, the Senator will not deny that in the long list of Attorneys-General they have always been distinguished men and able lawyers.

Now, Mr. President, why should not a case against the United States be committed to the Attorney-General? In this connection I will ask the Senator to allow me to read——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. ELKINS. It is bearing right on this case.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not consent to it, for this reason: I want to tempt, if I possibly can, the Senator from West Virginia into an address to the Senate upon this bill. For that reason only I am not willing to allow him to interject fugitive documents, which might be very material in a speech of his own, into my observations.

Mr. ELKINS. If the Senator objects, I will not insist on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRADLEY in the chair). The Senator from Iowa declines to yield.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator has intimated, further, some doubt about my failing to lay——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. ELKINS. May I answer that part? I ask the Senator's permission to do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I must yield.

Mr. ELKINS. I will not take any time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I must not decline to allow the Senator from West Virginia to say anything in explanation of his apparent indifference to this bill that he desires to say.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not see why the Senator finds it in his mind to charge me with any apparent indifference. This bill was just taken up yesterday. I believed the distinguished Senator from Iowa could probably as well as any Senator on the other side opposing the bill make the opposition's position clear, and I thought I would have the pleasure of listening to him. I do not see that that puts me against the bill or makes me indifferent to it.

I want to assure the Senator that I am most heartily in favor of the bill. I want to assure him further that I hope to convince him in part before we get through that some of the positions he takes here are not well taken. I was glad to hear him say yesterday that as to the jurisdiction of the commerce court he did not think it was so enlarged as to broaden the review. At first I believe he thought so. I thought so, but after reading the decision of Justice White in the Illinois Central Railroad case I changed my opinion. I think the Senator will be able to change some of his views, some of his opposition to the bill. It is not so bad, I am sure, as he thinks it is; and at some time I will explain its provisions. I thought probably by interruptions I could make many things clear, as the Senator is always very kind and indulgent in that regard; but it is improper it seems, as the Senator says, to interject communications bearing upon the appearance of the Attorney-General in these cases. I will reserve that for any fugitive, spasmodic, stray remarks I may make upon the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not had as much pleasure since the debate began as I have experienced in the last few minutes. I am glad to know that the Senator from West Virginia intends some time in the vague future to say a word in behalf of this bill. I am glad to know that he will try to convince me that it ought to pass exactly as it is written. I am glad to know that he is friendly to it. Although I have been closely associated with him upon the committee and upon the floor with regard to this bill, I have had in the last few moments the first intimation from him that he was well disposed toward the measure.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission, I will state that I voted for it, and I reported it. If I did not want the bill to pass, I could have gotten some one else, probably, to report it. That has been done before from my committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from West Virginia tempts me almost beyond endurance to state what happened when he voted to report this bill. But I still intend to hold my desire in check, although I can not tell at what moment such a suggestion as has just dropped from the Senator from West Virginia may induce me to do what I had not intended to do. But I return now to the point.

The Senator from West Virginia refuses to see the difference between committing to the Department of Justice these cases and the ordinary suits that are brought, not against the United States, because there are no suits brought against the United States except those that have been specifically provided for in the statute. The United States is not suable in any court. It has the prerogative to bring suits, but it is not often compelled to defend them.

Therefore there is no parallel in the position suggested by the Senator from West Virginia. But it is idle for men to contend that the question of freight rates, as they have been determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission upon the application and complaint of those who are interested in those rates, who are affected by those rates, can become a question of policy, to be dealt with at the whim of the Attorney-General, no matter how well intentioned the Attorney-General may be.

I take another case. Just a short while ago the railroads changed the differential upon hogs and packing-house products from Missouri River points to Chicago and to other markets. Theretofore Kansas City, Omaha, and Sioux City were competing upon somewhat even terms; but for reasons which it is not necessary for me to relate, the railways decreed that Kansas City should have a better rate upon those products than theretofore as compared with the rates obtaining from Council Bluffs, Omaha, Sioux City, and other Missouri River points north of Kansas City.

What happened, or what will happen, if it has not already happened? The packers and the hog buyers and the associations interested in the prosperity of Omaha and of Council Bluffs and of Sioux City will be complaining to the Interstate Commerce Commission that the rates imposed upon them are too high as compared with the rates which are given to their competitors. Shortly that suit will be tried by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and shortly the commission will render a decision.

I should like to know whether Senators believe that the merits of this controversy is a matter of policy when once decided, if decided in favor of Omaha; I should like to know whether the hog raisers and those interested in the markets in Nebraska are willing, after they secure a favorable decision from the Interstate Commerce Commission, to submit that question as a matter of policy to the Attorney-General in order to ascertain whether the suit brought by the railway companies shall be defended or whether it shall be allowed to go to judgment undefended.

I should like to know whether the people of South Dakota and of North Dakota, too, to some extent, will be satisfied after the Interstate Commerce Commission has reestablished the market at Sioux City and made it possible for that community to compete with Kansas City; I should like to know whether they will be willing to transfer to the Attorney-General the decision of the righteousness or the justice of the judgment of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think we have not yet fairly comprehended what will be the effect, no matter what has been the motive, of this change in the interstate-commerce law.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I should like the Senator's view upon this possible change in the bill; that is, to allow the interested parties to follow the proceedings by their counsel and act conjointly with the Attorney-General, even although the name "The United States" was substituted. Would that obviate the difficulty to which the Senator is now addressing himself?

Mr. CUMMINS. To a degree, Mr. President, it would.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, before the Senator from Iowa proceeds, I should like to ask one other question in connection with that asked by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD], merely adding to what the Senator said, if the shipper is given the right to intervene in connection with the proceeding.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I had that in mind, of course.

Mr. ELKINS. Before the Senator from Iowa proceeds, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I can remember both of these questions.

Mr. ELKINS. For instance, if I understood the Senator aright, he thinks the Interstate Commerce Commission can hear a complaint to determine and adjust the rates between localities—between Kansas City and Omaha, or Kansas City and Des Moines, or Chicago and Council Bluffs. Is it the Senator's position that the Interstate Commerce Commission has any jurisdiction to determine such rates? I should like to know the point in the law wherein the Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized to settle the differences between localities?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from West Virginia knows—I think he knows—about the present law. The Senator was here when the law was debated. He knows that when Council Bluffs or Omaha or Sioux City complains of rates upon commodities in which they are interested, the Interstate Commerce Commission determines whether those are just and reasonable rates. In determining those questions the commission takes into account the rates upon similar products from competing localities into the market. Of course the commission does not in its order establish a relation between the rates at Omaha and Kansas City, or the rates between Sioux City and Kansas City, but the commission, if it grants the relief that is asked, will reduce the rate from Omaha to Chicago and from Sioux City to Chicago, so that the rates it reduces will bear a proper relation to rates which the railway companies themselves have established for the business between Kansas City and Chicago.

Mr. ELKINS rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Allow me just a minute more. You know me well enough to know that I do not shrink from any conclusion. I believe, and I shall presently contend, that the Interstate Commerce Commission should have the power to decree definitely a relation between rates. The commission, however, has no such power at the present time, but accomplishes the result in the way I have suggested. The difficulty with the present law is that when the Interstate Commerce Commission reduces the rate from Omaha to Chicago and from Sioux City to Chicago, as I believe it will, then the railroads can destroy the effectiveness of that decision by themselves reducing the rate on the same product from Chicago to Kansas City. That is a defect in the existing statute which I very much hope Congress will remedy before they have ceased considering the pending bill.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, that brings up——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, yes.

Mr. ELKINS. That brings up the question of maximum and minimum rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not yield for that purpose. I do not want to debate that question now. I will come to it presently.

Mr. ELKINS. No; but I say it brings it up. I said that under the existing law the Interstate Commerce Commission had no right to establish such rates as the Senator claims. For instance, to make myself clear, if there is a rate from Kansas City to Chicago and from Kansas City to Minneapolis, both regular, both just, both fair, and both reasonable——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will stop right there, because if those rates are just and fair and reasonable—all of them—the commission, of course, will make no change whatsoever in them.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I think it is just to that solecism that the Senator leads in his argument. If all those rates are fair and reasonable and just, the Interstate Commerce Commission can not disturb them under existing law, although Chicago may get an advantage by that ruling; but it is out of the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission. All the commission can do is to determine whether a rate is reasonable and just. Chicago, from its environment, from its position, its location, great concentration of business, being a great city, situate on the Lakes, will always, other things being equal——

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not said anything about Chicago.

Mr. ELKINS. I am only speaking of this——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa declines to yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I say again I hope the Senator from West Virginia will content himself by asking me questions, because I am bound somehow or other to get him into a speech on this bill before we finish it, and I do not want to destroy the effect of it by allowing him to make it as a part of my remarks.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator is too good; he is too generous.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from Iowa declines to yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I decline to yield for a discussion of the subject which is mentioned by the Senator from West Virginia, but for anything pertinent to my present debate I will gladly yield.

Mr. ELKINS. I only wanted an answer to the question whether the commission would interfere with the rates if they were reasonable, although one locality got the advantage? That is the question. Answer that.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from West Virginia is very well aware—because I do not want anybody to draw, from anything that I have said as to the indifference of the Senator with regard to this bill, and the possible inference that he has never even read this bill—I do not want them to infer that he does not know about this subject, because I am sure he does know about this subject, and he can speak of it with an intelligence which will charm and instruct the Senate whenever he chooses to exercise those faculties of his mind and of his heart.

I come back now. Of course the Interstate Commerce Commission can not disturb any rate that it finds to be just and reasonable and fair, and I know that the Senator from West Virginia was in a jocular mood when he even proposed the inquiry.

Now, as to the questions proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] and the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT], I will say I have believed that if the defense of these suits shall be left with the Interstate Commerce Commission—as it ought to be, and as I believe it will be—then, while it might be desirable, it is not necessary, in my opinion, that the complainants in the proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be admitted as nominal parties to the suit instituted in the courts to enjoin the order, for I believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission, with its knowledge gained through investigation and with its motives, will defend the suits in the most energetic and faithful and intelligent way; but if in a moment of blindness Congress or the Senate shall transfer these cases to the office of the Attorney-General, then it is of the highest importance that the complainants in the proceedings before the commission shall be given the right to intervene and to present their views of the cases, both in testimony and in argument, because it must be remembered that the evidence that is adduced before the Interstate Commerce Commission is not and can not be used before the court.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The point I desired to call the Senator's attention to was this: If the right to intervene is given these shippers, and if the right to follow the proceedings is given to them, will that obviate the difficulties to which the Senator has been addressing himself?

Mr. CUMMINS. It will obviate some of the difficulties and add very much to the expenses of the men who have already gone forward and expended large sums of money in securing the orders against which the railways direct their attack.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. In answer to the suggestion of the Senator, if this action is against the United States, if the Attorney-General has control of it, and the Attorney-General should conclude that the order ought not to be defended, what would be the effect of these men having the rights the Senator has suggested?

Mr. CRAWFORD. The thought I had was that their right to intervene and follow the proceedings should be granted, and to that extent be placed beyond the control of the Attorney-General.

Mr. BORAH. In that event the Attorney-General would become entirely unnecessary.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Except in the larger sense. We have a dual view presented here. For instance, the interest attaching to the shippers and to the locality. That is one, and then the larger interest which the Senator in so entertaining a fashion discourses upon. Now, there may be this larger view, that goes beyond the local interest and the interest of the shipper, that it might be well to have presented, but not to the exent of depriving the shipper and the local interest of their day in court. Can not both run concurrently and have their right to be heard? That is the thought I had in mind.

Mr. BORAH. I do not care to take up the time of the Senator from Iowa further.

Mr. CUMMINS. The present law accomplishes exactly the end that has been so well stated by the Senator from South Dakota, and if any reason can be given for transferring this defense to the Department of Justice, it is yet to be heard.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. I should like to ask the Senator at this point whether the Attorney-General made any statement to the committee as to why this change should be made, or if he gave any reason for it?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that also calls for what transpired in an executive session; but I think it is entirely appropriate for me to suggest that the only reason the Attorney-

General gave to the committee was that an inquiry into the justice of rates and the practices of railroad companies was not of individual concern. While he did not so state, the effect of his argument was that it made no difference to the shippers, to those who were suing the railroad company as a common carrier, but the whole question was one of public policy, one of enforcing an abstract view of right and justice, and he thought the Department of Justice would be more likely to accomplish that result than the Interstate Commerce Commission. His view of it was one I never before heard advanced; and I have tried, but am yet unable to discover any validity or force in it. But I must pass on, Mr. President.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, would the Senator object to stating whether the Attorney-General entertained the view that this bill would put it within the province of the Department of Justice to sit in effect as a tribunal of review upon the justice and reasonableness and public policy of an order made by the commission before determining whether to defend it or not?

Mr. CUMMINS. I hesitate, Mr. President, to quote the Attorney-General, because I might not do it accurately; but, in response to an inquiry which I made during the time he was before the committee, his answers left upon my mind exactly the impression my colleague has just stated—that the very reason for substituting the United States as the party defendant and for transferring the defense to the Department of Justice was to give to the Department of Justice the opportunity to determine the policy of defending suits that were brought against the commission to set aside its orders. If I am wrong in regard to that, I am sure some other member of the committee who heard the statement will correct me.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, inasmuch as that statement has been made——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not remember the Attorney-General using the word "policy" at all; but he thought the interests of the whole country, including not only one particular class of shippers, but all of the people, would be better subserved by putting it upon the Department of Justice to appear and to defend in these cases. I do not remember the exact words now. His statement was not reduced to writing. As the Senator says, it was in a sort of executive session. The Attorney-General kindly consented to come before us and advise us about the bill and answer certain questions. That is my recollection of it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not desire to break into the argument of the Senator from Iowa. My mind is absolutely open upon this proposition, and I want all the help I can get; and if the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia whether any reason was urged by the Attorney-General or by anyone else why parties in interest who had instituted the proceeding before the commission and followed it successfully until an order was entered in their favor should be deprived of the privilege of following the proceeding in this new court and being represented by counsel. What reason, if any, was urged against that?

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield for the purpose of allowing the Senator from West Virginia to answer the question?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, the question was discussed at considerable length pro and con. The idea of the Attorney-General was that there would be uniformity, there would be harmonious action in defending these suits or in maintaining them for and against the United States; that there would be no divided responsibility; that the whole responsibility would be upon the United States, and in that event the United States, through its Attorney-General, would have to defend the interests committed to its charge under the bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But was the position taken that only the larger interest, the general welfare, should be considered, and the interests of the shipper or group of shippers or the community should be treated as an inconsequential matter?

Mr. ELKINS. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is the point I wanted to bring out.

Mr. ELKINS. Not at all. The case would come up to the court of commerce, the briefs of counsel who appeared before the commission would be before the Attorney-General, and he would look into them as he would into any other briefs, and probably he would employ some of the attorneys; but the Attorney-General took the position that unless the whole matter rested exclusively in the hands of the United States, and therefore in the hands of the Attorney-General, there would be confusion from a multiplicity of interests trying to direct a suit when it should be directed—certainly the assumption is—by one of the ablest lawyers in the country, the Attorney-General of the United States. It was not the purpose to deprive anybody of any right, and it was not claimed that it was.

Mr. PURCELL. Mr. President, I merely desire to ask the Senator from West Virginia in that connection whether or not the Attorney-General claimed he was the exclusive judge, or would be the exclusive judge, as to whether or not an appeal would be taken in case a rate were fixed?

Mr. ELKINS. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. PURCELL. Did the Senator understand, then, that a shipper would have a right to appeal from the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission whether it met with the approval of the Attorney-General or not?

Mr. ELKINS. A shipper can not appeal under certain conditions. He has no right to appeal; he is concluded by the action of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I feel that I will have to resume my consideration of this bill.

Mr. ELKINS. I can make that plain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa declines to be further interrupted.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will reply to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. PURCELL]. The shipper has no right of review. He must be content with the order of the commission. If the order of the commission, however, is in favor of the shipper, the railroad company can bring a suit to enjoin the execution and enforcement of the order. Such suits up to this time are defended by the commission. They are brought against the commission. This bill provides that they shall be brought hereafter against the United States and defended by the Attorney-General, and, of course, the Attorney-General will not defend a case that he believes has no defense; and in order to ascertain whether it has a defense he must examine the suit that is brought to him for the first time.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. JONES. I simply want to ask—I probably ought to know it, but I do not; that is, I am not sure—whether now suit is brought against the commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes, sir; it is.

Mr. JONES. What attorneys defend that suit?

Mr. CUMMINS. Any attorneys that may be employed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. JONES. Not necessarily the attorneys who were interested in the original proceedings?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not necessarily. Oftentimes, and, I think, in every instance, the Interstate Commerce Commission employs an attorney for the defense; but in nearly every instance it either admits to the record or admits in an advisory capacity the attorney for the complainant who has succeeded in securing the order.

Mr. JONES. They keep control of their side of the case?

Mr. CUMMINS. Absolutely.

Mr. PURCELL. That, in effect then, as I understand the Senator from Iowa, would make the Attorney-General of the United States the exclusive judge for the people of the United States as to whether an appeal should be taken.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Dakota does not state it quite accurately. There is no appeal taken. The suit is a suit brought by the railways, as this bill provides, against the United States, and then it becomes a question of whether that suit shall be defended or not.

Mr. PURCELL. That is what I mean.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Attorney-General by this bill is given absolute and uncontrollable authority to determine whether a defense shall be interposed, or whether the suit shall be allowed to proceed to final judgment.

I think now, Mr. President, that I may pass from this provision, important as it is, and I now send to the desk a series of amendments, which I propose on behalf of the minority of the committee, and request that the amendments be printed and lie on the table, to be hereafter offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, that order is made.

The amendments referred to are as follows:

Strike from line 9, page 8, the words "United States" and insert the words "Interstate Commerce Commission."

Strike from lines 11 and 12, page 8, the words "and in the Department of Justice."

Strike out lines 8, 9, 10, and 11, and the words "United States, and," in line 12, page 11, leaving section 4 to read: "The United States may intervene in any case or proceeding in the court of commerce whenever, though it has not been made a party, public interests are involved."

Strike out section 5, being from and including line 15, page 11, to and including line 3, page 12.

Insert at the end of line 8, page 9, the following:

"In any suit brought in said court of commerce to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission any person, copartnership, or corporation which was a party to the proceeding in which the order sought to be enjoined, set aside, annulled, or suspended was made shall have the right to appear in the court of commerce and be made a party thereto, and shall be permitted to introduce evidence and make argument as though an original party to the suit, and upon an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States shall be heard in like manner as though originally a party to the suit."

Mr. CUMMINS. One more suggestion with regard to the first six sections of the bill, and then I have finished with that part of it. I wonder if the Senator from West Virginia favors that provision of this bill which destroys the safeguard which I think he himself did much in 1906 to put around the practice of granting preliminary injunctions. Senators will remember that the law of February 11, 1903, called the expediting act, was applicable only to the antitrust law. It was provided that the cases must be heard before at least three judges, and if there were not three circuit judges in the jurisdiction in which the suit was brought, then the two circuit judges were authorized and required to call in a district judge. There were other provisions in that act which related to an appeal directly to the Supreme Court of the United States, and not through the circuit courts of appeals, as is true of other cases. In 1906 the law of February 11, 1903, was made applicable specifically to suits brought by railway companies to enjoin or set aside the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and with what result? That thereafter appeals were taken directly from the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States. I desire to read for the information of the Senate just what was accomplished in the law of 1906. I read from section 16:

The provisions of "An act to expedite the hearing and determination of suits in equity," etc., approved February 11, 1903, shall be, and are hereby, made applicable to all such suits, including the hearing on an application for a preliminary injunction, and are also made applicable to any proceeding in equity to enforce any order or requirement of the commission or any of the provisions of the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto. It shall be the duty of the Attorney-General in every such case to file a certificate provided for in said expediting act of February 11, 1903, as necessary to the application of the provisions thereof, and upon appeal as therein authorized to the Supreme Court of the United States the case shall have in such court priority in hearing and determination over all other causes except criminal causes: Provided, That no injunction, interlocutory order or decree suspending or restraining the enforcement of an order of the commission shall be granted except on hearing after not less than five days' notice to the commission.

Mark further:

An appeal may be taken from any interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing an injunction in any suit, but shall lie only to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Does the Senator from West Virginia know that this bill provides that there can be an appeal only from a final decree of the court of commerce? Does he know that the court of commerce is given the right by a single judge—not by two, not by three, but by a single judge—and without any notice whatsoever, to grant a temporary injunction against the order of the commission?

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not that absolutely destroy the provision that was included in the Interstate Commerce act of four years ago?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President and Senators, it not only destroys it inferentially, but the language I have read in that part of section 16 is absolutely repealed, and there is substituted for it a provision that any judge of the court of commerce can grant a restraining order without any notice if a showing of irreparable injury is made——

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. A mere pretense, if I am permitted to use that word, because the Senator from West Virginia knows, and every other Senator here who has been admitted to practice law in the courts of the United States or in any other court knows, that you can not secure a preliminary injunction anywhere, in any federal court, without the allegation and without the showing of irreparable injury; and yet it is made a pretext here of repealing one of the most useful provisions of the interstate commerce amendment 1906.

Now you propose to the people of the United States that after the Interstate Commerce Commission has entered an order, no matter how important that order may be to the shipping interests of the country, the railway company can appear before a single judge, and without any notice whatsoever can secure a preliminary injunction.

If you can defend that invasion of the act of 1906, if you can make the people of this country believe that you are attempting to amend the law for their benefit by striking down the shield which they have used now for four years for their own protection, I have yet to hear the attempt.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me for just a moment to say, as the Senator from Iowa was not at that time in the Senate, that there is no provision in the act of 1906 which received more care and which was passed with more reference to the absolute necessities of the case than the one he now speaks of, which is about to be repealed. I appeal to every Senator who was then in the Senate whether I have not stated the facts.

Mr. CUMMINS. In response to the Senator from Georgia I will say it is quite true I was not a Member of the Senate at that time, but I read with the greatest care that debate. It is one of the most instructive and notable debates that have occurred in Congress, and that contribution to the legal literature of the United States and its courts is one that everywhere is recognized as of the greatest possible value. Therefore, it was with the utmost surprise that I found in this bill a deliberate purpose to reverse the policy adopted by Congress in 1906, and to substitute for it a policy that had been contended for and fought for by the railroads from the moment Congress attempted to regulate them at all.

If the Senator from West Virginia has any response to make to that proposition I will pause now to hear what he has to say.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Iowa unduly, but the whole section to which he refers is omitted in section 10 of the bill under consideration, because the cases are transferred by the bill to the court of commerce, and there was no use for it. The procedure concerning interlocutory injunctions is set up in section 3. Section 2 regulates the appeals.

I am aware of the Senator's position—that an order should not be set aside except upon five days' notice—but, I think, as he has read the portion of the law that is omitted, he should allow me to read the section that takes its place. It is brief. It is only a few lines.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will be very glad if the Senator will read it.

Mr. ELKINS. This regulates the procedure. Section 3 takes the place of section 16 of the old law, about which there was such a contention here for months, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has observed.

SEC. 3. That suits to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be brought in the court of commerce against the United States. The pendency of such suit shall not of itself stay or suspend the operation of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission; but the court of commerce, in its discretion, may restrain or suspend in whole or in part the operation of the commission's order pending the final hearing and determination of the suit. No order or injunction so restraining or suspending an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be made by the court of commerce otherwise than upon notice and after hearing—

The five days' notice is not in there, nor is the three days'.

Mr. CUMMINS. Read on.

Mr. ELKINS. I will. I will gratify the Senator to the limit.

Mr. CUMMINS. Sure. I am afraid you never read that section before.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not know why the Senator says that. I have read it about a dozen times; I suppose about as often as the Senator has ever read it. It reads:

Except that in cases—

where irreparable damage would otherwise ensue to the petitioner said court or a judge thereof may allow a temporary stay or suspension in whole or in part of the operation of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission for not more than sixty days from the date of the order, pending application to the court for its order or injunction, in which case the said order shall contain a specific finding, based upon evidence submitted to the judge making the order and identified by reference thereto, that such irreparable damage would result to the petitioner and specifying the nature of the damage.

I think every safeguard is thrown around the granting of the injunction or the setting aside of the order that is possible. It does not require five days' notice, and I will tell the Senator and tell the Senate the reason. The court of commerce will sit in Washington; the Interstate Commerce Commission is here; and five days' notice is not required as it is in the cases of the circuit courts of the United States a long distance apart and away. Every safeguard is provided. The only exception is the case of irreparable damage, and the judge is required to certify——

Mr. CUMMINS. What difference does it make where the Interstate Commerce Commission is? It has nothing whatever to do with the case, and it would be impertinent if it were to appear in it or be interested in it in any way.

Mr. ELKINS. I agree with the Senator from Iowa precisely. The Interstate Commerce Commission should have nothing to do with it. It ceases to be judge, prosecutor, and investigator by this very act of procedure. The case is in the court of commerce.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, Mr. President, it is still the prosecutor, the investigator, and the judge. The only thing that is taken away from the Interstate Commerce Commission is the power to defend what it has done.

Mr. ELKINS. If the commission can not defend, if it can not investigate after the case goes to the court of commerce, I do not see how the Senator from Iowa can claim that it still is the prosecutor and judge. It ceases to be under this law, which says:

Otherwise than upon notice and after hearing—

The court has to give notice and hear—except that in cases where irreparable damage would otherwise ensue to the petitioner said court or a judge thereof may allow a temporary stay or suspension in whole or in part of the operation of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

This law of irreparable damage has been the law for hundreds of years. The question was debated before. The bill does not change that feature of it. But if the judge grants it for that reason he so certifies. I think it is a better provision than the other provision in the old law.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from West Virginia did not intend to say that the act of 1906 did not change the equity practice in this respect. It is positive in its provision that no preliminary or interlocutory injunction shall be issued without five days' notice, and yet you are about to create a court of commerce, situated in Washington, as far as it is possible to get from those who are interested in the outcome of its decisions, and because you remove it these miles away from those who will watch its proceedings with the utmost interest the Senator from West Virginia says the court ought to be permitted, or any judge of it ought to be permitted, without any notice whatsoever, to grant a preliminary injunction or a stay or a restraining order.

Senators, if there has been one act of Congress that has received universal approval it is the act which required notice before a temporary injunction or any restraining order is issued suspending the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission. And there is no reason why notice should not be given.

Do you remember that an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission can not take effect until at least thirty days after its entry, and therefore there is adequate time for a railway company which desires to assail it to give notice of its intent to apply for a preliminary injunction or a restraining order? And yet, notwithstanding that, you propose in this bill to allow the railway companies to postpone their action until the last hour that precedes the moment when the order shall go into effect, and then apply to a single judge in the very extremity of the country for a restraining order without any notice whatsoever.

But that is not all. Tell me, if you can, why you have taken from the law the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from an order granting a preliminary injunction? That privilege has been of inestimable advantage to the people of this country within the last four years.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Tell me why you limit the appeal from the court of commerce to a final decree? That was the law; that is the law of the United States, and it has been for years in relation to equitable proceedings. There was no appeal under the judiciary act of the United States until final decree, but in order that the shippers might be adequately protected you gave to the country and those interested in these suits—the Senate, the Congress, gave four years ago—the right to appeal from an order granting a preliminary injunction; and tell me why you have taken that right away from the shippers.

Mr. ELKINS. With the Senator's permission, I think his question invites a reply. I deny that the right of appeal is taken away or impaired in any way. I read section 3, which regulates the procedure. I will read section 2, which regulates appeals, and I think the Senator will permit me to do that, because of his question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Tell me why. I am perfectly familiar with the section. It does limit the appeal to the final decree.

Mr. ELKINS. Well.

Mr CUMMINS. Tell me why this law takes away the right of appeal from an order——

Mr. ELKINS. I do not think it does.

Mr. CUMMINS. From an order granting a preliminary injunction.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not think it does. Listen. I call the attention of Senators to this language:

SEC. 2. That a final judgment or decree of the court of commerce may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States if appeal to the Supreme Court is taken by an aggrieved party within sixty days after the entry of said final judgment or decree. Such appeal may be taken in like manner as appeals from a circuit court of the United States to the Supreme Court.

Now, whatever governs the appeals in those cases governs in this.

And the Supreme Court may affirm, reverse, or modify the final judgment or decree of the court of commerce as the case may require.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. ELKINS. Let me read it through.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question right here.

Mr. ELKINS. Very well.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from West Virginia, as a lawyer, affirm to the Senate that under the section just read there may be an appeal from the court of commerce in granting an interlocutory injunction?

Mr. ELKINS. To the extent that they are allowed in the practice of appealing cases from the circuit courts to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Ah, Mr. President!

Mr. ELKINS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I ask him to allow me to finish this, which regulates appeals. Whatever this says settles that question.

Appeal to the Supreme Court, however, shall in no case supersede or stay the judgment or decree of the court of commerce appealed from, unless the Supreme Court or a justice thereof shall so direct, and appellant shall give bond in such form and of such amount as the Supreme Court, or the justice of that court allowing the stay, may require.

Appeals to the Supreme Court under this section shall have priority in hearing and determination over all other causes except criminal causes in that court.

Mr. CUMMINS. I must defend the Senator from West Virginia against himself. It is not fair to him that it shall be assumed by the Senate that he believes that this section gives the right of appeal from interlocutory orders. Allow me to read it again, and if the Senator from West Virginia will listen to me——

Mr. ELKINS. I do not see how the Senator from Iowa can get any different meaning out of it. I was certain that appeals from interlocutory decree was allowed in section 2. I so state in the report of the majority. I will see.

Mr. CUMMINS. It reads:

SEC. 2. That a final judgment or decree of the court of commerce may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States if appeal to the Supreme Court is taken by an aggrieved party within sixty days after the entry of said final judgment or decree. Such appeal—

"Such appeal," that is an appeal from the final judgment or decree, as has been the practice for years and years—may be taken in like manner as appeals from a circuit court of the United States to the Supreme Court.

That is to say, the procedure in taking an appeal, the manner of perfecting the appeal from a final judgment or decree of the court of commerce, shall be fashioned after the procedure in taking an appeal from a circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a minute?

Mr. CUMMINS. Gladly.

Mr. NELSON. The following words in section 16, as amended by the act of 1906, are omitted from this bill. I will quote them. They are omitted from the amendment:

Provided, That no injunction, interlocutory order or decree suspending or restraining the enforcement of an order of the commission shall be granted except on hearing after not less than five days' notice to the commission. An appeal may be taken from any interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing an injunction in any suit, but shall lie only to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The words I have just read are omitted from the amendment in this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; and if it were not for those words there would be no appeal to the Supreme Court or any other court from an order granting a preliminary injunction. It was only by those words that Congress gave to the people interested in this subject the right of appeal from an order that might be granted by an inferior court and that might result in injury to the people in whose behalf the original order of the commission was issued.

But if the Senator from West Virginia will follow me just one step further, I will agree to convince him beyond the shadow of a doubt.

Such appeal may be taken in like manner as appeals from a circuit court of the United States to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court may affirm, reverse, or modify—the final judgment or decree of the court of commerce, as the case may require.

What?—

I know that after the Senator from West Virginia shall have had the opportunity of reflection, and possibly of consultation, he will not reiterate what he has just declared to the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. After he shall have read the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not conceive that we are about to emasculate, about to cripple, about to weaken a law that was adopted four years ago after the most exhaustive consideration and after having heard in the completest way possible of the needs and necessities of the business of the country.

Mr. President, I now pass to the desk an amendment which I shall propose to this bill, restoring the provisions of the law of 1906, and which, if we are to be inflicted with this court of commerce, will give the right to appeal from an interlocutory order and which will require notice before any injunction is issued suspending or setting aside an order of the commission.

I do not ask that the amendment be read at the present time, because I have stated its full purport, and will only request that it be printed and lie on the table, to be hereafter offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that course will be pursued.

The amendment is as follows:

Strike from line 16, page 10, all after the word "suit," to and including line 7, page 11, and substitute therefor the following:

"No injunction, interlocutory order, or decree suspending or restraining the enforcement of an order of the commission shall be granted except on hearing after not less than five days' notice, and appeal may be taken from an interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing an injunction in any suit to the Supreme Court of the United States."

Mr. CUMMINS. I now pass the first six sections of the bill, and pass the court of commerce, and pass all its incidents in order to reach the most startling proposition, the most destructive proposal that has been heard in regard to this subject in years.

The next section of the bill is an amendment to section 5 of the present act, as I recall it. Senators will remember that this is the act which prohibits pooling, and there is to be added to this section—and now mark you, Senators, because I can not think that many have realized what is proposed to be done—section 7 of this bill repeals the antitrust law with regard to traffic agreements, and it proposes to make them effective without the approval of the commission. In order that there may be no controversy with regard to it, I read the first few lines of section 7 of the bill, and it has a history as interesting as a romance:

That section 5 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph, as follows:

"Agreements between common carriers subject to this act specifying the classifications of freight and the rates, fares, and charges for transportation of passengers and freight which they agree to establish, shall not be unlawful under the act to regulate commerce as amended, or under the act approved July 2, 1890, entitled, 'An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies,' or otherwise, if a copy of such agreement is filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission within twenty days after it is made, and before or when any schedule of any rate, fare, or charge, or any classification made pursuant to the agreement is filed with the commission."

Then it proceeds to say that the rates which may be specified in any such traffic agreement must be filed by the individual railroads, and that the commission simply retains the same power and authority over those rates as it has over all other railway rates, and they may be investigated and changed and reduced or increased, just as all other rates that have for years been made by railroad companies. But I want Senators to understand that the agreement itself is not to be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. There is no suggestion of approval by the United States Interstate Commerce Commission, although the rates may be inquired into, and if they are found to be unreasonable or unjust and discriminatory they may be set aside and others substituted in their stead.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, does the Senator understand the purpose of this section to be that simply the filing of such an agreement is all that is necessary to make it lawful, although it may be discriminatory and unjust in its provisions, that the mere filing of it makes it lawful in the contemplation of the act?

Mr. CUMMINS. Is that the whole question?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is that the Senator's understanding? I confess that the language used apparently means that, but it struck me as being so remarkable that the mere filing should be all that was necessary to make lawful what otherwise was unjust and discriminatory that I thought there must have been some slip in the language used.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; it is the same slip here that we find in a great many other parts of this bill. There are nothing but slips in certain parts of the bill.

Now, I will answer the Senator from South Dakota, and I will try to do it with the utmost fairness. These traffic agreements are to be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the commission is given no authority whatsoever over them; it can no more touch them or deal with them than can the Senator from South Dakota.

But these agreements, although specifying possibly the rates, do not in and of themselves make the rates. The railroads which are parties to the traffic agreement must in addition to the agreement file their schedules, as the law now requires, and the commission retains its power to inquire into the rates that have been thus presented by the several railroad companies exactly as it can inquire into them now. If anyone complains of any of these rates the commission can investigate that complaint, and if this law passes, in other respects the commission can of its own motion inquire into these rates. But so far as the agreement is concerned, it is completely beyond any authority or jurisdiction of the commission.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The point I want information on is simply this: Suppose the railway companies enter into an agreement which upon its face is clearly in violation of the Sherman antitrust act, shall it be made lawful by simply filing it with the commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. This section expressly says that it may be done, notwithstanding the provisions of the antitrust act. It repeals the antitrust act so far as such agreements are concerned. It expressly repeals the antitrust act with regard——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is it the position taken by those in the committee in favor of the provision that it has an effect of that kind?

Mr. CUMMINS. It never was questioned. Mr. President, there was no position taken in the committee by anybody who was in favor of the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. The only position taken was by those who oppose the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. There was no such understanding on the part of any member of the committee that I know outside, possibly, of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know what the position of the Senator from Rhode Island was.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator was expressing the opinion of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not suggest that it was the position of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. Most certainly it was not.

Mr. CUMMINS. There was a conspicuous silence in the committee with regard to all these things.

Mr. ELKINS. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, I should like to state the position of the committee on this subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I can not do that.

Mr. BAILEY. What part of the committee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I insist that the Senator from West Virginia, if he be so advised, shall take up this bill, and if he regards my argument as worthy of answer that he shall answer it in a consecutive way. He does not do himself justice by these fragmentary and disjointed colloquies that occur from time to time.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield to the Senator from South Dakota for that purpose.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator from Rhode Island says that that was not the understanding. I should like to have his view as to what this language means, where it says that agreements between carriers shall not be unlawful if filed with the commission.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator will read the rest of the section, he will find an explanation of it.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I confess I have had some trouble to understand how it meant otherwise than that the filing removed its illegality.

Mr. CUMMINS. The more the Senator from South Dakota studies the section the more he will discover that there is not any other interpretation that can be put on it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. The whole truth is that they are trying to reverse the Supreme Court of the United States. They originally contended that the antitrust act was not intended to include the railroads, and that contention was overruled by the court. The effect and purpose of this is to take the railroads, to this extent, at least, from under the operation of the antitrust act and to confine them entirely to the interstate commerce act. I take it that the Senator from West Virginia, if I might tempt him to his feet, would not deny that that is the purpose of it.

Mr. ELKINS. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, I will answer that.

Mr. BAILEY. Before the Senator answers, he said a moment ago that he wanted to explain what was in the mind of the committee. I want him to specify just what part of the committee, the majority that did not approve this bill or the minority that did.

Mr. ELKINS. In the minds of those who reported the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I want a moment to consider whether I will yield for the purpose stated by the Senator from West Virginia or not. I think I will, but I want it to be understood that I am occupying but a small proportion of the time that is being consumed. I do not want to incur the ill-will of Senators upon the assumption that I am speaking for days when, as a matter of fact, I am dividing my time amongst a great many who are interested in the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to make a very short statement?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield to the Senator from Rhode Island, and afterwards I will yield to the Senator from West Virginia, but it must be understood that I am going right through this bill if it takes me four days to do it.

Mr. ELKINS. That is right.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I do not want to be misjudged in regard to the time I occupy.

Mr. ALDRICH. I simply want to say that for myself I do not consider myself bound by an agreement between the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Texas as to what I think the bill means.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I must answer that, Mr. President, by asking the Senator from Rhode Island when have I stated what he understands this bill to mean? I have very studiously avoided any such suggestion, because I have not the least idea what the Senator from Rhode Island believes the bill to mean.

Mr. BAILEY. I have the advantage of the Senator from Iowa. I know exactly what the Senator from Rhode Island thinks it means. The Senator from Rhode Island thinks it means exactly what I said it meant.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas may have an intuitive knowledge of other Senator's views upon a great many subjects, but he has not the slightest idea apparently, from his statement, as to what my views are upon this subject.

Mr. BAILEY. I have served here something like nine years with the Senator from Rhode Island, and never yet have I known him to get what he wanted without knowing when he had it. The Senator from Rhode Island knows exactly what this bill means, and it means exactly what, in that respect, he wants it to mean. The Senator from Rhode Island was one of those who never believed that the antitrust law—now, I am venturing this; I do not know it; I only believe it—the Senator from Rhode Island was one of the Senators who never believed that the antitrust law was intended to apply to the railroads. The venerable Senator from Massachusetts, now passed away, declared, and I understand that Senator Sherman declared on the floor of the Senate, that it had not been the purpose of Congress when they passed the antitrust act to include the railroads in it, expecting that they would be left to be dealt with under the interstate law.

Mr. ELKINS. What does the Senator from Texas think on that subject? Does he think——

Mr. BAILEY. I think the antitrust act was intended to punish and prohibit every unlawful combination, whether made by individuals or corporations, or, if made by corporations, of whatever kind or character. In other words, I think the Supreme Court was right on that question. Does the Senator from West Virginia differ with them?

Mr. ELKINS. No; I do not differ with the Supreme Court, but the men who passed the act never had any idea that it applied to railroads.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the Supreme Court misconstrued the law.

Mr. ELKINS. They interpreted the language, but the men who passed the act had no such idea when they passed it.

Mr. BAILEY. No man ever lived who will ever get the Senator from West Virginia to contradict anybody if there is a possible way to avoid doing so.

Mr. ELKINS. Not the Supreme Court.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senate has heard with surprise his remark from time to time when he said that Congress meant one thing, notwithstanding that court declares that Congress meant a different thing.

Mr. ELKINS. I agree with Senator Hoar and Senator Sherman that it did not apply, in their minds.

Mr. BAILEY. I stated that merely as a recollection. The Senator from West Virginia confirms me. Now, what did the Senator from Rhode Island think about that?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island, I think, agreed with the Senate. I venture the assertion that no man in the Senate who voted for the so-called Sherman antitrust law had the slightest idea that it would apply to the railroads. I think that is a historical fact.

Mr. BAILEY. And you are now trying to take the railroads from under it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg the Senator's pardon; we are not trying anything of the sort.

Mr. BAILEY. You did not intend to put them under the antitrust act, but did so; and now you are trying to take them out.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Texas and the Senator from Iowa are entirely mistaken as to the purpose of that law and its effect.

Mr. CUMMINS. This section is just as plain as the English language can make it. There is not any possibility of mistaking what it accomplishes. There is no hidden meaning in it. Its meaning is blazed right across it.

Mr. ELKINS. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I defy any master of the tongue to state the purpose more clearly and plainly than is found in the bill. I suppose the Senator from Rhode Island believes that it does just what it says. It repeals expressly the antitrust law with regard to traffic arrangements.

Mr. ELKINS. Now, will the Senator allow me to state what I think the language means?

Mr. BAILEY. What the committee thought it meant?

Mr. ELKINS. And the committee that reported it; the majority of the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to challenge that statement. The Senator must be accurate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa has the floor. Does he yield further?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have yielded to the Senator from West Virginia for the purpose of making an explanation that I honestly think is sadly needed, and I am quite willing that the Senator from Texas shall hold him to the explanation.

Mr. BAILEY. And to the accuracy of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia has the floor.

Mr. ELKINS. Now, if I may be allowed, the bill provides:

> Agreements between common carriers subject to this act specifying the classifications of freight and the rates, fares, and charges for transportation of passengers and freight which they agree to establish, shall not be unlawful under the act—

It should not be unlawful under the Sherman Act. I will not quote the whole of it. That is what it means—> if a copy of such agrement is filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission within twenty days after it is made.

Now, the making of the agreement is not unlawful and the filing of the same agreement is not unlawful, but the rates, the schedules, the classifications, the fares, and charges might be unlawful. The Senate knows and everybody knows that the railroads have to violate this law every day in order to operate their roads.

Mr. BAILEY. To violate a law of Congress?

Mr. CUMMINS. I for one challenge that statement.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me make myself plain. The railroads enter into agreements every day. They do not do it in a way that they can be prosecuted, but how otherwise can you fix a rate between New York and Chicago with all the railroads?

Mr. CUMMINS. Each railroad can fix it for itself.

Mr. ELKINS. If the Senator will allow me, they do fix it that way. President Roosevelt, in a number of messages and statements, always declared that he favored the making and filing these agreements not unlawful.

Mr. CUMMINS. I challenge that statement.

Mr. ELKINS. I can produce the message here.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from West Virginia will not find any statement from the former President of the United States favoring the validation of such agreements until they are approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. ELKINS. I said the President favored it, and it is in the platform. It is in the Republican platform in just the words, probably, that the President used.

Mr. CUMMINS. When I come to the political side of this question and discuss the Republican platform, I shall be very glad to call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to what the party has declared; but just now we are considering it from its economic and abstract standpoint, instead of a political standpoint.

Mr. ELKINS. The section provides:

If a copy of such agreement is filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission within twenty days after it is made, and before or when any schedule of any rate, fare, or charge, or any classification made pursuant to the agreement is filed with the commission; but all provisions of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and all provisions of this act and any future amendments thereof shall apply to such agreed rates, fares, and charges, and such agreed classifications, and the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have—

And so forth.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator read the last clause? I commend that to the attention of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ELKINS (reading):

And all provisions of this act and any future amendments thereof shall apply to such agreed rates, fares, and charges, and such agreed classifications, and the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have like control over and power of action concerning any agreed rate, fare, charge, or classification—

Now, there is not only——

Mr. BAILEY. They would have that without anything in this law; they have it now.

Mr. ELKINS. If the Senator will let me get through—they have it now. They can on their own initiative set it aside. They never had that power before, but this bill confers upon the commission the right to make the rates absolutely without complaint. I will read it:

And the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have like control over and power of action concerning any agreed rate, fare, charge, or classification, including suspension of the rate or classification before it becomes effective. The right of suspension of the rates or schedules is given the moment they are filed.

It is not the agreement that is harmful; it is what the agreement provides that may be harmful. The schedule of rates, the fares or charges—and these are under the control absolutely and specifically and definitely in the language of this bill—before it becomes effective and pending investigation of its propriety, as if the rate, fare, charge, or classification had been made without agreement.

Absolutely without agreement. They have the sole jurisdiction. They can stop it and nullify it on their own motion.

Mr. DOLLIVER. For how long?

Mr. ELKINS. Forever, if they want to.

Mr. DOLLIVER. No; sixty days.

Mr. BAILEY. It would take the Senator sixty days to get his breath.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection, Mr. President——

Mr. ELKINS. I will not continue to an undue length. Let me finish the reading:

And pending investigation of its propriety, as if the rate, fare, charge, or classification had been made without agreement.

All that is material. The commission controls it absolutely. They can do anything they may wish with these rates, schedules, or fares under this bill, and with greater power than they ever had before, and they have the power to take the initiative. Now, listen:

And any party to such agreement may cancel it as to all or any of the agreed rates, fares, charges, or classifications, by thirty days' notice in writing to the other parties and to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and such agreement of carriers, though filed with the commission—

"Though filed with the commission"— shall not be deemed—

What?—

shall not be deemed a tariff or schedule of rates, fares, or charges collectible from the public, or operate itself to alter any such tariff or schedule whensoever filed and published, but nothing in this section contained shall be deemed to authorize the making of agreements for the pooling of freights.

Now, will the Senator allow me, or does he think I have consumed enough time?

Mr. CUMMINS. Inasmuch as I really regard this as the first reading of the bill, I will allow it to proceed.

Mr. ELKINS. Now, Mr. President, that is the material thing for us to settle here. Why not permit these agreements to be filed when the essence, the substance, is left entirely within the jurisdiction and control of the commission, with larger powers than the commission ever had before? It says they shall have no force until they are passed upon by the commission.

Now, if one of these agreements that have to be entered into, and you can not conduct railroads without them, is filed with them, with it goes schedules, rates, fares, and classifications. Is there anything wrong in that? They have not only the jurisdiction they have now under the present law, but an extended power over them, to set them aside on their own motion.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. ELKINS. I am through.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from West Virginia took the floor to explain what this provision meant, and he was going to explain what the committee thought it meant.

Mr. ELKINS. I have just done so.

Mr. BAILEY. He has simply defended it, without any attempt to show the Senate what it means.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not control the time. I will be very glad to give the Senator from Rhode Island that full opportunity when I come to speak. I want to say, Mr. President, that those of us not on the committee might be well excused for not knowing what the committee think about it, because no Member of the minority has illuminated the bill with any discussion, the majority advising the Senate what it meant, but they are doing it in the peculiar attitude of a minority. This bill did not come out of the committee with a majority in favor of it.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is a perfectly immaterial fact.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no; it is not immaterial.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think so.

Mr. BAILEY. The truth of it is that at a full committee meeting this bill never would have come to the Senate. But that is a matter——

Mr. FLINT. Who was absent from the committee?

Mr. BAILEY. I am not going to invade the committee room to suggest that any Senator failed in the performance of his duty. I will say it was not the Senator from California. I will exonorate him, and that is enough. But some Senators were sick, I know, and the Senator and the Senate know that one of the best and most attentive of Senators lay upon a bed of affliction and could not be there.

Mr. FLINT. That is what I want brought out. I wanted attention directed to the fact that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] was ill and could not be here.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not mention that. I could not mention the name here and his great affliction without saddening the hearts of all, and I preferred to leave that personal phase of it apart.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, perhaps I ought to say a word on this question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator for any reasonable suggestion.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is well understood, there is no concealment about it, I assume, that if the Democrats, with certain gentlemen who have been acting with them more or less on occasions, had voted together upon this bill in the committee there would have been no majority of the committee in favor of it. The motion that was made in committee was acquiesced in by a majority of the committee, that the bill should be reported to the Senate with every member reserving the right to vote as he pleased upon amendments and upon the final passage of the bill. If the Senator from Texas is able to say that this alliance was an actual alliance, and that the votes were against this bill and against reporting it, then I have nothing further to say, but my understanding is not along that line.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Texas would not interfere with a pretty family quarrel like that, and that there is an alliance is not——

Mr. ALDRICH. This is not a family quarrel at all. It is a line of cleavage which is marked and distinct and definite.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator from Rhode Island for any discussion of this bill that is appropriate to my own observations, but I am not willing to yield to any Senator for the exposure of mere partisan or political propositions.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator permit me to say a word as to the matter now under consideration?

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will express my understanding about the paragraph which is now under consideration. In my judgment, the practical effect of this is that no schedule of rates can be effective without the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. If the language is such that it does not cover that point, I, personally, desire to have it made so.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Iowa yield for one other question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. With the permission of the Senator from Iowa, I wish to say that does not touch the point that I made a while ago, to the effect that this was intended to take the all-rate agreements of the railroads from under the operation of the antitrust law.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not at all. It does not do it, in my judgment. Unlawful rates or unlawful combinations can not exist for the fixing of rates if this bill becomes a law, any more than they can to-day.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, but if they were prosecuted they would be prosecuted under this law?

Mr. ALDRICH. They would be prosecuted under the Sherman Act, and the reservations in this bill contained are clear to that effect. If they are not clear, I desire that they shall be made clear.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the only way the Senator from Rhode Island could make clear what he now suggests would be to withdraw the section entirely, for it is a specific repeal of the law of 1890 so far as agreements between railroads respecting rates, fares, charges, and classifications are concerned.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Rhode Island will permit me——

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator yield to me for not more than a minute?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I found myself in such substantial and positive disagreement with the Senator from Iowa with reference to every paragraph and every provision of this bill, and the Senator from Iowa was in such disagreement with all the friends of this measure, so far as I was able to see, that it was impossible for us to go into an extended discussion in the committee as to what changes and amendments should be made; but there is no reason why Senators should not favor and secure the adoption of such amendments of the bill as commend themselves to the majority of this body.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think we are to be congratulated upon being assured that the Senate may amend this bill as its wisdom may suggest, but I did not suppose that the privilege I accorded to the Senator from Rhode Island would be used for the purpose that he has used it. I state, in answer to what he has just said, that he never heard any amendment proposed by me to this bill, that he did not hear my suggestions before the committee with respect to the bill I introduced myself. Just how the Senator from Rhode Island is able to state with such confidence that he would have rejected every amendment that I might have offered if the bill had been considered by the committee, is more than I can understand. If he means to assert that he and I look upon most public questions from a different standpoint, then he is quite correct; but I had hoped that, even though we do look at some questions from a radically different point of view, he might have listened in the Interstate Commerce Committee to the amendments which I am now arguing before the Senate. The Senate must judge whether the amendments that I would have offered to this bill, if it had been considered in the committee, are so radical and so absurd that they did not deserve the consideration of the Senator from Rhode Island or the other members of the committee. Have I proposed as yet anything so unreasonable as to warrant the suggestion made by the Senator from Rhode Island? Senators, I long ago—and I mean by "long ago" long ago in the history of this session of Congress—abandoned all hope of being able to improve the interstate-commerce law; and I am doing the best I can now to merely hold on to what we have. I shall be wholly satisfied if this bill emerges from Congress so that it will insure to the people of the United States those privileges and that protection which were granted to them by the act of 1906, and I have not as yet suggested a single amendment that was not intended to restore the law to the form substantially that it has borne for four years. If my amendments therefore were so radical and so ridiculous that it was unnecessary to hear them before the committee, I was taught in the school of 1906, and you, Senators, are responsible for the views that I entertain and which I have endeavored to engraft upon this bill.

I do not believe that this discussion will be improved by bringing into it any such suggestions as have been made by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. President, as I remarked a few moments ago, this section is as clear as the English language can make it. There ought not to be any opportunity for a difference of opinion with regard to it. It says:

> Agreements between common carriers subject to this act specifying the classifications of freight and the rates, fares, and charges for transportation of passengers and freight which they agree to establish shall not be unlawful under the act to regulate commerce as amended, or under the act approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," or otherwise, if a copy of such agreement is filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission within twenty days after it is made.

I recall to the attention of Senators the very notable history of the country with regard to these traffic agreements. In 1896 there came before the Supreme Court of the United States the case against the Trans-Missouri Freight Association. That association, as alleged in the bill, was composed of 18 railway companies, and they made this agreement with respect to the territory which is described, as I recall it, beginning with about the ninety-fifth meridian, running north to the Red River, along the Red River, then to the Missouri at Kansas City, along the Missouri until it crosses the Montana line, then along the eastern border of Montana until it reaches the Canadian line, then west to the Pacific Ocean and south to the Republic of Mexico, east along the line that divides the two countries until the Gulf of Mexico is reached, thence along the border of the Gulf of Mexico to the point of beginning. This agreement was made between these railway companies for the purpose of controlling freight rates in the territory I have described, which territory is ordinarily known among railroad men as the trans-Missouri field. I merely wish to read section 3 of that agreement, and that agreement is one of the agreements which is to be validated by this proposed law. Section 3 in that case provided that—

> A committee shall be appointed to establish rates, rules, and regulations on the traffic subject to this association, and to consider changes therein, and make rules for meeting the competition of outside lines. Their conclusions, when unanimous, shall be made effective when they so order, but if they differ, the question at issue shall be referred to the managers of the lines parties hereto, and if they disagree it shall be arbitrated in the manner provided in article 7.

That is the heart of the trans-Missouri traffic agreement. It reached the Supreme Court upon a bill filed by the United States under the antitrust law. There it was contended by the railroads, as has been described by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], that the antitrust law of 1890 did not apply to railroads. It was learnedly and carefully and fully argued by some of the most distinguished lawyers of the United States. I hope that every Senator, before he is required to vote upon this bill or upon this section, will be able to read the majority opinion of the Supreme Court in the Trans-Missouri Freight Association case. It is one of the clearest expositions of the dangers which may be incurred by such agreements, and gives also all the reasons that can possibly be given by those who favor such agreements. The result was that the Supreme Court held as to this traffic association and this agreement, the one to be unlawful and the other to be void under the act of 1890, and the Trans-Missouri Traffic Association dissolved.

Just a little while afterwards a similar bill was filed against the Joint Traffic Association. That association embraced the rates from Chicago to the Atlantic coast, and there were, as I remember it, 31 railroads involved in the agreement. Again the question reached the Supreme Court in the case of the United States against all of these railroads concerned in and participating in the Joint Traffic Association; and again the condemnation of the Supreme Court of the United States was recorded. Why? Simply because it was said in each of these cases that the thing sought to be preserved in the law of 1890 was competition. The only purpose of passing the antitrust law was to save to the people of the United States, if possible, some competition in their commercial, industrial, and transportation life. The Supreme Court in these two cases illustrated, with a force and with a comprehensiveness that it would be vain for me to even attempt to emulate, the effect of these agreements upon competition.

Ever since that time the railroad companies of the United States have been trying to remove from their own operations the antitrust law, and finally that result is accomplished in this bill, for I repeat——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think that the President of the United States and the Attorney-General of the United States had that purpose in view?

Mr. CUMMINS. I know that the Attorney-General had that purpose in view. It is not a conjecture. The Attorney-General wrote this bill, and it declares a repeal of the antitrust law so far as these agreements are concerned. It is idle now to fatigue our minds with regard to technicalities. The agreements that I have just mentioned, made in the absence of the bill which we have now before us, would be unlawful. They were so declared by the Supreme Court, but under the bill that we are about to pass, if we pass it, the agreements would be lawful.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator does not mean that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CUMMINS. I mean just what I say, and I say it after the most mature reflection.

Mr. ALDRICH. I doubt it absolutely. This bill delegates to the commission the right to fix maximum reasonable rates. The bill provides that the rates provided for in the agreements shall be filed with the commission—and I wish to read just for a moment, in answer to the question asked by the Senator from South Dakota some time since, just one sentence. It will take me but a minute:

> And such agreement of carriers, though filed with the commission, shall not be deemed a tariff or schedule of rates, fares, or charges collectible from the public, or operate itself to alter any such tariff or schedule whensoever filed and published—

Which seems to be perfectly definite.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Rhode Island can hardly deceive himself with respect to the language that he has just read. That means simply that the rates which may be contained in a traffic agreement shall not be established rates on the part of the railways under the law as it now is, but that each railway must for itself file its rates just as it has done heretofore. That is the whole purpose of the language just quoted by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I want to ask the Senator from Rhode Island what this language in section 7 of the bill means and what is the purpose of putting it in? I quote from the bill:

> Agreements between common carriers subject to this act specifying the classifications of freight and the rates, fares, and charges for transportation of passengers and freight which they agree to establish shall not be unlawful under the act to regulate commerce, as amended, or under the act approved July 2, 1890.

What is the object of putting that provision in if it is not to make the railways immune from the provisions of the antitrust law? Why not eliminate that language if that is not the purpose?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the purpose of this provision was to allow agreements to be made as to rates, provided those rates were reasonable and the classifications were reasonable. If they are unreasonable, they get no power under this provision at all, and whether they are reasonable or unreasonable is a matter to be decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission, who are given the power of initiative by this bill. I have no question about the effect of that language, but I myself have no objection to providing definitely that the rates shall receive in advance the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is all I have ever asked.

Mr. NELSON. Why inject these new difficulties? What is the object of putting in that language?

Mr. ALDRICH. The object of putting it in, I take it, by the gentleman who put it in—because there is no use of disguising the fact that this bill is here prepared by the Attorney-General of the United States, under the direction of the President; not that that precludes us from amending it at all, but the purpose of the authors of the bill is the purpose of the President and of the Attorney-General——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the Senator must not hide behind the President. That will not do in this case. To hide behind the President is small business.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not hiding behind the President.

Mr. NELSON. We are discussing this bill on its merits, regardless of either the Attorney-General or the President. I respect both officers; but it will not do for Senators to meet arguments that are made here, and say "this is the bill of the President" or "this is the bill of the Attorney-General." That is not the way to legislate; and that is no way to argue to the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not in the habit of hiding behind anybody, the Senator from Minnesota or anybody else. That is not my habit, and I do not intend to commence it now. The Senator from Minnesota was asking why this section was in the bill. I answered, telling him why it was here; and if it does not carry out the purpose of its authors, let us make it do so. I am not getting behind anybody or trying to avoid my own responsibility as a Senator of the United States in connection with this matter at all. I say that this provision is in the bill because it was recommended by certain high officials. The President of the United States and the ex-President of the United States on several occasions have recommended a change of this character in the interstate-commerce law. The platform of the party to which I belong—and I suppose the Senator from Iowa does——

Mr. CUMMINS. I know I belong to it, and I suppose the Senator from Rhode Island belongs to it, but I will come to that point directly, Mr. President.

Mr. ALDRICH. The platform of the party gave distinct approval to this particular change.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will bear the matter in mind, Mr. President, when I come presently to consider the platform.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not expect to have the Senator from Georgia agree with me as to the reason, but I think the provision as it stands accomplishes what the Senator from Iowa says it ought to accomplish, and if it does not, so far as I am concerned, I am ready to join with any Senator to amend it so as to make it perfectly definite and plain.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator from Iowa I want to recall an incident which I once witnessed in this Chamber when a very distinguished Senator who then ornamented this Chamber, and who has now, unfortunately, gone to his long home, standing immediately in front of where the Senator from Rhode Island stood a moment ago when he invoked the name and influence of the President of the United States—the late Senator Hoar—resented and denounced it as an invasion of the privileges of this Senate for any Senator to state in this place whether the President of the United States was or was not in favor of any proposed legislation.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I did not say what the President of the United States was in favor of. I simply stated what every man in the Senate knows and every man in the United States knows, that this bill was prepared by the Attorney-General of the United States under the direction of the President; but I did not undertake to say what their motive was in offering it here.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to say that I think if the President of the United States or the Attorney-General can prepare a bill and bring it to this Senate, and it can be passed under their dictation, the Senate has fallen from its high estate.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, there is no man in this body that would resent the dictation of the President of the United States sooner than I would. I have done it when it required—I will not say "courage"—but I have done it on many occasions, and I expect to do it hereafter whenever the opinions of the President of the United States do not comport with my judgment; but I——

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Rhode Island has been here twice as long as I have. I have been here fifteen years, and never, until within the past twelve months, have I ever known the repeated admission and acknowledgment of the fact made on the floor of the Senate, as it is made by the Senator from Rhode Island to-day, that we are proceeding in the consideration of measures which did not originate with this body, the terms and particulars of which were not thought out by any member of this body, but which are accepted at the dictation of those who do not belong to the legislative department of the Government.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Senator has been here long enough, I am sure, to have voted for and supported hundreds, or at least scores, of measures that have been prepared by the executive department. There never was a more striking illustration of that than during Mr. Cleveland's administration.

Mr. BACON. I was here during the last two years of Mr. Cleveland's administration, but I do not recall any such incident.

Mr. ALDRICH. Did the Senator vote for the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act?

Mr. BACON. That was before I came here; but I do not think even that bill was prepared by the Executive.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have known bills to be prepared under Democratic as well as Republican administrations, and I have known that the Senator from Georgia and every other Senator when such bills reached here acted upon his oath as a Senator and upon his own judgment. I do not consider myself bound by any of the provisions of the pending bill unless I believe in them myself as a Senator of the United States—not one word or syllable. I was only stating an historical fact, which is known to every Member of this body, as to how this bill was prepared.

Mr. BACON. Then, Mr. President, why is it that at every stage and turn of this discussion we are hearing about the fact that the President of the United States and the Attorney-General have prepared the bill, and why are we being told what they thought and what they intended us to understand?

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to answer that question.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to answer it myself a little first. [Laughter.] The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] asked why this section is here and what were the motives of the men who put it here. He will have to inquire of somebody else than myself. Whether it meets with my approval or not is a question for me to decide; and I intend to decide, without reference to anything outside of my own judgment and my obligation as a Senator of the United States. There is no mistaking my attitude about this matter. I will assume that the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Texas are in the same position, but that they will not vote against a measure because it was prepared outside of this Chamber.

The Senator from Iowa on yesterday made a long and labored argument that this bill had no right to be here, and he apparently is opposing it because it is here under the conditions which it is. That does not appeal to me. I have no prejudice one way or the other on account of the authorship of this bill; but I am bound here to investigate every one of its provisions, every syllable and every word of it, and to act upon it independently, as the Senator from Georgia will, without any partisan bias whatever.

Mr. BACON. And yet the Senator, Mr. President, and those who are acting with him are constantly seeking to bolster up this bill by alluding to what the President of the United States thinks and desires and what the Attorney-General thinks and desires.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have not undertaken to bolster up this bill at all. I am simply saying that I think it is a little out of place for a Senator either to oppose this bill or to favor it because the President of the United States is for it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question? Why did the Senator from Rhode Island a few moments ago ask me if I meant to impute to the President of the United States and the Attorney-General the motive to repeal the antitrust law with respect to traffic agreements?

Mr. ALDRICH. Because the bill is here, and we know how it came here. I am not undertaking to question the motives of the men who sent it here, but when the Senator said that it is an evident attempt to repeal the antitrust law, I simply asked him whether he thought the well-known authors of this bill had that purpose in view.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. President, might I have permission to say a word?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to smooth this matter out between the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Rhode Island. The real purpose the Senator from Rhode Island had was not to influence us or to influence the other side; but it was to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact that the Senator from Iowa is not in agreement with an administration measure. Whenever he wants to accentuate that kind of a difference I am ready to help.

Mr. ALDRICH. It did not need any arguments or statements of mine.

Mr. BAILEY. That was the purpose the Senator had.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is fairly well known.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I can not refrain from calling the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the provisions of an instrument with which I can not believe the usages of the Senate are at variance, and specifically to the terms of the third section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States, which has no more solicitous guardian than the Senator from Georgia. The words of the section, describing the powers of the President, are:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

It would seem to me quite incredible that when the President of the United States has recommended to Congress a measure which he, in the discharge of this constitutional duty, deems expedient, aye, when two successive Presidents of the United States have recommended the same measure, it should be contrary to any rules to refer to the fact that the measure proposed is in accordance with the recommendation of the President.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BACON. Have I the permission of the Senator from Iowa to respond to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to correct a misapprehension on the part of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and then I will yield to the Senator from Georgia.

The bill under consideration is not the bill recommended by the President, and attached to the message which the President very appropriately and quite within his rights transmitted to Congress early in January. The bill before the Senate has been changed in very many and very material respects since that time upon suggestions of the Attorney-General.

Mr. BACON. I am very much obliged to the distinguished Senator from New York for the compliment he pays me in suggesting that possibly I am solicitous for the careful guarding of all the provisions of the Constitution, though I do not at all arrogate to myself the high office of being one charged with any greater degree of responsibility or of solicitude in that regard than any other member of the Senate is, or at least should be, considering that each one of us before we took our office in this body was required to take a solemn oath that he would thus preserve it in all of its features.

I desire to say to the Senator that in what I have suggested I have had no disposition or desire to unduly criticize the President, but that I am animated simply with a proper solicitude for the recognition and preservation of the rights and privileges of this body as a branch of the legislative department of the Government. I have not been forgetful of the provision of the Constitution which the Senator from New York has so kindly read to the Senate, nor am I forgetful of the exalted station and of the high constitutional prerogatives of the President.

But, Mr. President, I think I can say with absolute confidence that the Senator himself does not construe that provision to mean that the President of the United States is to communicate to the Congress what he may deem to be of importance in the way of information, or of measures which are entitled to consideration by the Congress, in any other way than in a message to Congress. The Senator from New York is too good a lawyer, being recognized as one of the best in the land, for me to suggest to him any argument in support of such a proposition. Nobody disputes the right, but, on the contrary, everyone recognizes the right of the President of the United States to formally communicate to Congress and to suggest any matter of legislation which he may deem proper and important for the attention of the Congress.

But that is a very different matter from the framing in every detail of measures outside of Congress, not only one, but many, which are advertised in the newspapers as administration measures, with the full knowledge and avowal that their enactment is required of the Congress. When such requirement can be undisguisedly made, and is as undisguisedly acquiesced in by Congress without regard to the individual views of its Members, then I repeat the legislative department has fallen from its high estate.

Mr. President, there is a wide difference between the performance of the duties as contemplated by the Constitution, in which the President by reason of his continuous engagement——

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. BACON. As I have started, I hope the Senator from Iowa will let me finish my answer. Engaged as the President is in the continuous performance of his duties and the public matters constantly under his attention, there is a wide difference between his not only having the power, but also being under obligation to communicate to Congress matters of public interest which may require legislation, and his proceeding to secure the enactment of certain measures communicated to Congress in an altogether different way, and with the advertised purpose to require the enactment of those measures. The functions of the executive and legislative branches of the Government should be exercised separately and kept apart.

As I have been permitted to respond to the Senator from New York, I hope the Senator from Iowa will permit me to go a little further to illustrate this matter. There is a wide difference between the proper function of the President of the United States in the suggestion of proper matters of legislation and his going forward to practically control Congress in the enactment of legislation. It is a matter of degree under different circumstances.

Mr. President, I desire to narrate something which illustrates the fact that a deliberative body can come to a point where it ceases to be a deliberative body—where it ceases to have any will and is only the expression of the will of the executive. I wish to narrate what I have seen in another country, a country having the form of a republican government. I will not name the country, because it would not be proper that I should do so, but I am very willing to tell any Senator who may ask me what country it was. I will not state it in this place.

I have been in the capital of a country which in form is republican. I have for a week attended the sessions of a house corresponding to our House of Representatives. I have seen the deliberations of that body during all those days in which there was not a word of debate, in which a motion was never made by a member of the house, in which nothing was ever done except to vote upon bills, and in which I never saw a vote cast in the negative upon any bill. Day after day, without a word spoken in debate, I have seen measure after measure read to that body, and then the roll called—they did not take the vote in the ordinary way, but always by a call of the roll—and in no single instance, in a week's observation of that body, did I ever see or hear one single member vote in the negative, but always "yea."

Being struck by that remarkable scene, I sought an interview with one of the members and asked him: "How is it that in no instance has there been cast a negative vote upon any bill? How is it that nobody has anything to say? How is it that nobody ever makes a motion or objection to anything? And," said I, "for illustration, to-day I saw two long bills passed in the house. The clerk read the bills; then the proper officer of the body called the roll, naming each member present, and in each instance each of the two bills was passed by unanimous vote, the only answer being 'yea' on the part of each member." He said: "Those were simply bills sent to us by the President, and there was nothing to debate and no reason why we should vote against them."

I will not detain the Senate longer, but I want to state something that happened a few days ago. I narrated that incident to a group of Senators, some of them Democrats and some of them Republicans, and after narrating it I said that if any member of that house of representatives in that country had voted in the negative, doubtless he would have been dismissed from office. I said, of course, the President of the United States can not dismiss anyone from legislative office, and one of the Republican Senators spoke up and said: "Yes; but he can take away the patronage of a Senator, which is the same thing as dismissing him from office."

Mr. President, that is all I desire to say in the matter. I did not expect to have the necessity of saying this, because by no suggestion would I impute a wrong motive to the President; but when the Senator from New York reads a section of the Constitution and implies that I am forgetful of the right of the President of the United States in this matter, it is proper that I should point out what I think, in all courtesy and respect to him, is his constitutional function.

While, of course, I have no anticipation that men of our blood and men of our race will ever be reduced to the position of the country to which I have alluded, it is simply a question of degree. While men may not come to the point where they will unanimously vote in accordance with what in effect is practically the dictation of the executive department even though not so intended, it is certainly an approach to that condition when the majority of them can accept a measure simply because it happens to come from that source; and when the majority thus act, the practical effect is the same. The Congress is by such act made to abandon its legislative function.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me for a moment?

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. ALDRICH. For one minute.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. The presence of the Senator from Georgia in this Chamber is an indication that Senators are not sent here or kept away from here on account of patronage. I resent that imputation.

Mr. BACON. I did not say that.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is what I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. BACON. I did not say that. I said, on the contrary——

Mr. ALDRICH. What the Senator said comes pretty near to that. He said that the President might withdraw patronage——

Mr. BACON. I did not.

Mr. ALDRICH. And defeat——

Mr. BACON. I did not.

Mr. LODGE. He said it was the same thing.

Mr. BACON. I did not. What I said was this, if the Senator from Rhode Island will permit me to repeat it. I said that in narrating that incident, I said to a group of Senators that the President could not exclude anybody from the legislative Chamber, and a Republican Senator replied, "Yes, but he may take the patronage away, which is the same thing." I did not say that. I was quoting what the Republican Senator said.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should say the Republican Senator ought not to be quoted unless he is named. But that was not what I wanted to say.

The question of the preparation of measures by the Executive or by people connected with the executive department is not new. It not only applies to the President of the United States, but it applies to the executives of the States. If I am not misinformed—and I do not want to say anything with respect to the Senator from Iowa that is incorrect—it was his habit during the seven or eight years that he occupied the executive chair of the great State over which he presided to send to the legislature of Iowa messages prepared, with his recommendations, and I think his power over the legislature of Iowa was such that they rarely if ever failed to pass the acts which he recommended.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not know that we will ever return to the bill before us, but I must answer the Senator from Rhode Island now.

I was governor of Iowa for seven years. In that time I never suggested or dreamed that I could send to the legislature a bill which it was expected to pass.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is not quite the question. My question was whether the Senator had prepared bills, or had them prepared by the executive department, which were offered and adopted. I did not suppose he sent them by messenger.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I will not invoke the indulgence of the Senator from Iowa for more than a moment.

I wish to supplement the remarks of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], with which in general I agree most fully, by saying this: It has been for a long period the uniform practice of committees in both branches of Congress to call to their assistance in considering and shaping measures referred to them for their consideration and report the executive officers of the Government who are in possession of practical and detailed information affecting the subject-matter of the measures.

I am sure the Senator from Georgia will agree with me that many a forenoon which he has passed in the Committee on Foreign Relations in discussing, and sometimes with pencil and paper drafting and redrafting, provisions of legislation and of treaties with the Secretary of State has been well spent. I am sure the members of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate will agree with me that many a day passed with the Secretary of War in performing some duties regarding matters before the committee has been well spent. That is the general rule with the committees of both branches of Congress.

Mr. President, one of the weaknesses of our system is the lack of perfect coordination and understanding between the legislators and the Executive. The other great representative governments of the world get over that difficulty by having the heads of the government departments occupy seats on the floor of the chamber of the legislative body. Great Britain does that; France does that; Germany does that; Austria does that; Italy does that.

Mr. BACON. And they are all members of the body in which they occupy seats.

Mr. ROOT. They are all members of the body in which they occupy seats.

Their presence in the body, ready at all times to bring to the illumination of the subjects under discussion their detailed and practical knowledge of administration, is of the greatest assistance. We can not do that. I would not change our system, Mr. President, to make it conform to that European model. But the thing which is accomplished by the adoption of that system, it has become the settled and the sensible practice of our Govermnent to accomplish by the presence of the heads of the executive departments in the rooms of our committees while they are considering the subjects referred to them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator from New York will not think me ungenerous if I suggest that I should like to resume soon the consideration of this bill.

Mr. ROOT. Will the Senator from Iowa add to his very great courtesy, which I highly appreciate, permission that I may say one sentence more?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. It is: According to my understanding, the bill which is now before the Senate was recommended in original form to the Congress by the President in a formal message, was introduced by the Senator from West Virginia in this body, and referred to the committee of which he is chairman. That committee, proceeding to consider it, taking a considerable amount of testimony, called in, it appears, the Attorney-General of the United States, who had been engaged in enforcing the law which the bill proposes to amend, and secured from him just the same kind of assistance that it is the universal practice of our committees to secure from the heads of executive departments.

In the course of that consideration, in the light of the advice and suggestion invited from him by the committee, this bill has been modified and varied in many particulars, and is now reported by the committee.

For one I do not hesitate to say that one strong reason why I am inclined in favor of the measure is that it is in substance the measure recommended by the President of the United States in the performance of his constitutional duty.

Mr. ELKINS. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. ELKINS. I believe he asked me to cite——

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not hear the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ELKINS. I think the Senator from Iowa asked me——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Iowa will permit me to say that while I do not now further trespass on his time, I should be glad under other circumstances to respond to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt the debate is very interesting. I should like to reply to the Senator from New York, because he has misconceived the history of this bill and its passage in the committee.

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like very much to resume the consideration of the question, Why should we repeal the antitrust law?

Mr. ELKINS. Bearing upon that, I ask the Senator's indulgence for a moment.

In the course of my reply to some questions which the Senator asked me, I referred to President Roosevelt's recommendations. Will he allow me to read from them, as stated in his messages?

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask if the Senator from West Virginia intends to work into my speech all that he has to say about this bill?

Mr. ELKINS. No; I do not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then I suggest that you reserve what you have to say and put it into your own speech.

Mr. ELKINS. I asked the Senator's permission, because I thought he asked me to produce the authority, and I have it here. It will take but a moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. What did I ask the Senator to introduce?

Mr. ELKINS. I think he doubted my statement that President Roosevelt had frequently in his messages recommended the repeal of this part of the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to your sending anything you please to the desk and having it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ELKINS. I will read just these two lines.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I should like to proceed with my remarks.

Mr. ELKINS. I will read these two lines.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa declines to yield, as the Chair understands.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Iowa is so tender hearted that he can not refuse any request, and therefore he yields to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ELKINS. I thank the Senator most heartily.

President Roosevelt, in his message to the first session of the Sixtieth Congress, says:

> As I stated in my message to the Congress a year ago, railroads should be given power to enter into agreements, subject to these agreements being made public in minute detail and to the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission being first obtained.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am heartily in favor of that now——

Mr. ELKINS. Let me read again.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I have said here a score of times. The difficulty is that the pending bill does not so provide.

Mr. ELKINS. I will read some——

Mr. CLAPP. Just one moment.

Mr. ELKINS. I want to read on.

Mr. CLAPP. I am not only willing, but I insist upon that now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa has not yielded.

Mr. ELKINS. I have not yielded to the Senator from Minnesota. I want to read from President Roosevelt again.

Mr. CUMMINS. I decline to yield.

Mr. ELKINS. If you will not hear what Roosevelt had to say, what will you do?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am thoroughly in favor of it. I have asked the committee from the beginning to do it. My amendment proposed it, and the majority of the committee stand in the way of putting into this bill the very provision that President Roosevelt recommended to Congress and which Congress up to this time has refused to recognize.

Mr. ELKINS. I can read some more.

Mr. CUMMINS. I proceed now, Mr. President——

[Mr. ELKINS started to leave the Chamber.]

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator from West Virginia will not fly.

Mr. ELKINS. No; I will be right back.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, we are considering the question, Shall Congress repeal the antitrust law with respect to traffic agreements, with respect to agreements specifying rates, charges, and classifications? I assert again that this section repeals in form the antitrust law in regard to these provisions. It does retain the jurisdiction of the commission over all the rates of railroad companies, whether they are contained in these agreements or whether they are filed in the schedules under the law as it is.

But it is idle for the Senator from Rhode Island and idle for the Senator from West Virginia to contend against the obvious proposition that this repeals the antitrust law so far as the agreements themselves are concerned.

The Senator from Rhode Island doubts my Republicanism. He has been doubting it ever since I entered the Senate, and I have no doubt he will continue to doubt it so long as I remain in the Senate. I do not wonder at that, but I want to suggest that I am not alone in my view. He said that the committee was endeavoring to carry out the Republican platform of 1908 with regard to these agreements. Allow me to read our plank of that year:

> We believe, however, that the interstate commerce law should be further amended so as to give railroads the right to make and publish traffic agreements subject to the approval of the commission, but maintaining always the principle of competition between naturally competing lines and avoiding the common control of such lines by any means whatever.

In the minority report we stated our opinion to be that this section put into effect the agreements on the part of the railway companies without the approval of the commission, made them effective before the commission examined them at all, and, indeed, there is no jurisdiction in the proper sense to examine these agreements in any respect. The majority report paid its respects to us in the following language:

> The contention that this declaration can only be complied with by requiring the approval of such agreements by the Interstate Commerce Commission before they become operative is—

Now, mark you, all that we have contended from the beginning—these minority Republican members of the committee composed of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] and myself—all we have insisted upon from the beginning is that before these agreements shall become operative, before they shall go into effect, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall examine and approve them. That is one of the radical and astounding amendments that the Senator from Rhode Island refused to hear from me because of my well-known unsound views upon all questions.

> The contention that this declaration can only be complied with by requiring the approval of such agreements by the Interstate Commerce Commission before they become operative is, in the opinion of your committee, destitute of the slightest foundation.

Now, mark the keen reasoning of the distinguished Senator from West Virginia:

The right to make agreements "subject to the approval of the commission" is obviously a very different thing from the right to make agreements only with the previous approval of the commission.

That is, it is the view of the majority that the declaration of our platform, which says that such agreements may be made subject to the approval of the commission, does not require the approval of the commission before the agreements go into effect. I submit to impartial Senators the reasoning of the majority in that respect. I can hardly deal with it with the patience that one ought to exercise in addressing a body of this kind.

I understand perfectly that in the message of the President of the United States transmitting this bill that seemed to be his view as well, and that he seemed to recommend that the Senate should pass a bill which would permit these agreements to go into effect without the approval of the commission. But I appeal from the declarations that are now made, both from him and from the committee, to an earlier view that was held by the President of the United States concerning this subject. I beg to read an extract from the speech of William Howard Taft, at Cincinnati, Ohio, July 28, 1908, accepting the Republican nomination for the office of President of the United States. He was then determining whether he could give his assent to the doctrines which had been announced in the Republican platform held a few weeks before, and I assume that his view then was the deliberate judgment of one who was about to ask the suffrages of the people of the United States for the high office he now occupies. He said:

It is agreeable to note in this regard that the Republican platform expressly, and the Democratic platform impliedly, approve an amendment to the interstate-commerce law by which interstate railroads may make useful traffic agreements if approved by the commission. This has been strongly recommended by President Roosevelt, and will make for the benefit of the business.

So will any agreement which specifies the rates that are to be charged by the railway companies that enter into an agreement which has been approved by the commission, in which the rates have been examined by the commission and found to be fair and just and reasonable. It would be indeed useful to the Nation to not only allow the railways to file such agreements, but to impose upon the commission the duty of examining these agreements and examining these rates before they go into effect.

If there be any difference between this announcement in the speech of acceptance and the recommendation of the President which accompanied this bill, then I appeal from his recent to his earlier judgment.

I, however, do not content myself with that declaration. I have another. It is an extract from a speech of President Taft, made in Des Moines, Iowa, Monday, September 20, 1909. You will remember that it was in this speech that the President dealt in the most exhaustive way with the amendments that were to be proposed or the amendments that were needed, both to the antitrust law and to the interstate-commerce law. This is what the President said upon that occasion:

In addition to these amendments to the law which are looking to a rather more drastic regulation of railroad rates than heretofore, another provision should be added by which railroads may be permitted to agree upon traffic rates and make contracts with respect to rates that shall not be pooling contracts, but shall constitute agreements as to rates—provided always that such agreements shall receive the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. In this wise the operation of the antitrust law against traffic agreements between railroads—

Now, listen! The Senator from Rhode Island has unfortunately abandoned the Chamber, but I hope that some friend will convey to him this sentence from the President of the United States, as indicating what the section we are now considering means—

In this wise the operation of the antitrust law against traffic agreements between railroads will be abolished.

And yet with a bill which has been organized for the purpose, in part, of carrying out this declaration, a purpose in which I have the profoundest sympathy, in which I entirely concur, the Senator from Rhode Island now, in order to escape the odium of having participated in reporting a measure which not only repeals the antitrust law, but removes the agreement from the jurisdiction of the commission for approval, denies that the law is intended to repeal the Sherman Act or any part of it. Now, listen again:

In this wise the operation of the antitrust law against traffic agreements between railroads will be abolished; and against their absolute prohibition would be substituted a requirement that such agreements shall meet the approval of a properly constituted tribunal.

This was the policy of the Republican party, affirmed in its platform, explained in the letter of acceptance, reiterated in the important address by the President during his recent journey.

I am bound to believe that these expressions represent not only the Republican policy, but the real view of the President of the United States, and I refuse to accept the suggestions of gentlemen who seem to believe that it will be a compliance with this platform and in harmony with these declarations if we pass a bill that repeals the antitrust law in regard to these agreements and allow them to pass into effect without the approval of the commission or without any supervision on the part of any government tribunal.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator permit an interruption for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Unless I should hear some good reason to the contrary, I am very much disposed to agree with what the Senator has said to the effect that this section of the law ought to make it clear that these traffic agreements shall not be effective unless the Interstate Commerce Commission shall approve them. The Senator has doubtless studied this bill with great care; I have not, and I want to submit this question to the Senator.

The evident effect of the section is to take this class of agreements with reference to classifications and rates out of the operation of the antitrust law and to put them under the operation of the interstate commerce law. The provision seems to be that this class of agreements shall not be unlawful under the antitrust law if they are filed with the commission. But the provision goes on and stipulates that the commission shall still have control over the rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. There never was any proposition to take away from the commission the jurisdiction over rates.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand. I had not quite reached the point of my inquiry.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will wait.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The contract itself can not be construed as establishing the rate.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The law itself expressly so provides. The rates provided for by the contract, therefore, do not go into operation if the commission declares that they are unreasonable. In other words, does not that cover the point which the Senator is undertaking to cover by his amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Namely, that the contract can not become an effectual contract to affect rates until the commission has had an opportunity of passing upon it?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Utah is mistaken in the conclusion just expressed. All the rates that are in force in the United States have been established by filing schedules on the part of the common carriers with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The commission can upon complaint, and if this law is passed can, upon its own motion, examine any of those rates to ascertain whether they are fair, just, and reasonable. If this bill passes, it would be in the power of all the railroads of the United States to enter into an agreement with each other that the rates now on file in the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be maintained and preserved for such length of time as the agreement might prescribe. The commission would have no power to deal with the agreement at all, although it could thereafter as theretofore inquire into any of the rates which had been legally established by the common carriers through their schedules filed with the commission, and condemn them if they found them to be unjust or unreasonable.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I interrupt the Senator further?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator from Iowa think that an agreement under this clause could be made carrying into operation rates already made by the railroads?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It would seem to imply that the agreements were only with reference to future rates, because it provides that it shall be—filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission within twenty days after it is made—

That is the agreement—

and before or when any schedule of any rate, fare, or charge, or any classification made pursuant to the agreement is filed with the commission.

It would seem clearly to indicate that the rates provided for by the agreement must be filed either at the time the agreement is filed or after the agreement is filed. It could not affect the past rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think that would be the construction to be put upon the words, but if it were, the conclusion that I have announced would still be true; that is to say, the agreement has nothing whatsoever to do with the jurisdiction of the commission in investigating the rates. The commission retains the power over rates, but it has no power whatsoever over the agreement, and no jurisdiction is given to it to inquire into it in any respect.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the rates are the effective part of the agreement. The agreement without the rates amounts to nothing.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have just presented to the Senate two well-known cases before the Supreme Court of the United States of very effectual traffic agreements that did not mention the rates in them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am speaking of the rates to be established under the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. All rates under this bill are established by filing with the commission the schedules of rates.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But this particular agreement itself amounts to nothing until the rates are provided for. That is the point I want to make.

[At this point Mr. CUMMINS yielded the floor for the day.]

Thursday, March 17, 1910.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, when the debate upon the bill to amend the interstate-commerce law closed last evening, I was considering that section of the bill which proposes to repeal the antitrust law, in so far as traffic agreements between railway companies are concerned. I beg to lay again before the Senate the declaration of the Republican party adopted in 1908 upon this subject. It was there announced:

> We believe, however, that the interstate-commerce law should be further amended so as to give railroads the right to make and publish traffic agreements, subject to the approval of the commission, but maintaining always the principle of competition between naturally competing lines and avoiding the common control of such lines by any means whatsoever.

It is asserted by the chairman of the committee, and very specifically stated in the majority report, that the section of the bill now under consideration is in harmony with this declaration of our platform. I challenged that statement yesterday. I challenge it again; and I assert that it is not only not in harmony with the Republican platform, but it is directly, positively, and unequivocally opposed to it.

It was suggested by my distinguished friend from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], who just honors me with his presence, that our platform did not and does not require that these agreements be approved by the commission before they go into effect. I repeat that a platform which declares for such agreements when made subject to the approval of the commission can mean nothing else than that they are to be approved by the commission before they become effective. This section of the bill does not confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to approve or disapprove these traffic agreements. It does reserve to the commission the same jurisdiction and power over the rates of the railway companies that the commission now has with regard to all rates, but no other or different or greater power.

I called the attention of the Senate yesterday to the significant fact that the President of the United States, in his speech of acceptance delivered shortly after the convention was held in Chicago, declared in express terms that the platform meant that these agreements were to become effective if approved by the commission.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The language of the platform is that these agreements shall be subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. I read it again:

> We believe, however, that the interstate-commerce law should be further amended so as to give railroads the right to make and publish traffic agreements subject to the approval of the commission.

Mr. BORAH. Now, if A and B should make a contract subject to the approval of C, would anybody contend that that would go into effect before C had given his approval?

Mr. CUMMINS. I never dreamed that any interpretation other than the one just suggested by the Senator from Idaho could be put upon this declaration in our platform until the imagination, and I must think the enforced imagination, of my friend from West Virginia found in these words the extraordinary meaning asserted in the report of the majority of the committee.

I take it for granted, Mr. President, that there is no Senator here who will in the future contend that the Republican party intended that these agreements should be fastened upon the American people, reversing the policy of the people and of the party through a long series of years, until they did receive the approval of a tribunal created by the Government for the very purpose of protecting the people against the avarice and aggression of the railway companies.

I refer again to the fact that our distinguished leader so understood the platform when he became the candidate of our party. But he so understood it at a very much later time, because in September of last year, to be specific, on the 20th day of September last, in a speech in Des Moines, which was everywhere proclaimed to be his studied and serious effort to advise the people of his views with regard to this particular question, he there declared that he was in favor of these agreements, provided always before they became effective they shall be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I do not know whether he has changed his opinion upon this important subject or not; it is for others to inquire with respect to that matter. I have found it very difficult to harmonize the message of the President in transmitting this bill to the Senate with his declarations upon the two occasions to which I have referred. I will leave others to effect that reconciliation, if they can; and if they can not, then I ask that the interpretation which is the natural construction of our platform and the construction which he twice placed upon it in previous addresses shall still be the interpretation that will guide the Senate of the United States.

There is an excellent reason for this, Senators, and I will take advantage of the time which must always be consumed at this hour of the day for Senators to refresh themselves to amplify just a little the reasons which led the Republican party to make the declaration which I have read in the hearing of the Senate.

There are two forces in business life which can be safely trusted to fix prices, and only two. The first and natural force is that of free, unrestricted, unhampered competition; the second is the power of the Government, exerted through some appropriate tribunal.

I believe, and I have no hesitation in avowing, that the time will speedily come—in truth, it has come now—when the Government of the United States should undertake to fix all railway rates. In doing so, we would but follow the example of Great Britain in its legislation respecting England and the railways of England. The experience of that country through a period now of twenty-two years has advised the whole world that, if railways are not to be owned by the government, their rates must and ought to be fixed by the government.

Slowly we are approaching that problem, and I have no doubt that in the end we will solve it just as Great Britain has solved it. But in the meantime, until the Government does undertake to prescribe schedules of rates for common carriers for all the business of the United States, we must encourage rivalry and preserve all the competition we can amongst our common carriers. The antitrust law passed in 1890 had no other purpose than to preserve competition in the business of the country.

We understand—every reasonable man understands—that there must be some cooperation among railways. I do not hesitate to say that a certain degree of cooperation is essential in order to preserve stability in the business in which they are engaged.

But it is not necessary to go to the length of giving to the railway companies the right to enter into agreements respecting their rates. We have never dreamed of so doing; the Republican convention did not dream that it was so declaring. That convention meant that so far as the rates made by the railway companies were concerned, which were submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission for its approval, if the commission approved them, then the agreement with respect to them should not be regarded as unlawful. That was the position taken by our party in 1908.

Allow me to suggest only for a moment what will happen if this bill passes as it came to us from the Attorney-General and the President of the United States: That great territory west of the Missouri River, west of the line that I indicated yesterday, called the trans-Missouri territory, will, through its traffic association, meet and agree upon the rates that are to prevail in that territory. All the railroads engaged there in business will agree that thereafter no rate shall be changed unless with the approval of the board of directors created by the traffic agreement. The rates thus agreed upon will be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission as the rates of the railroads in that territory. Every vestige of independence will disappear; every motive for competition will be overcome. There is a great difference between cooperation, by which one railroad advises another of railway rates, and the creation of a contract that such rates shall be the rates and that the railroads entering into the agreements shall surrender their privilege of initiative and their right of independent action.

The Central Traffic Association, governing the business between Chicago and the Missouri River, will also meet, and that association will agree that all the railroads doing business there shall commit their fortunes to a board of directors or a supervisory board, and that no rates shall thereafter be changed save with the consent of such board. The Joint Traffic Association, which would control the rates between Chicago and the Atlantic coast, will meet, and they will agree for all their railroads upon these rates. Their agreement will be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the rates which they prescribe will there be filed.

I want you to consider what the result will be. The Interstate Commerce Commission will have before it agreements entered into by all the railroad companies of the United States, and they will have before them how many rates? I will not attempt to say just how many rates would be covered by the agreements covering these three great zones of the United States.

[At this point Mr. CUMMINS yielded to Mr. DIXON, and the roll of the Senate was called.]

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Iowa, I desire to ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Iowa is now discussing the effect of section 7 of the pending bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am.

Mr. CLAY. That section reads as follows:

> Agreements between common carriers subject to this act specifying the classifications of freight and the rates, fares, and charges for transportation of passengers and freight which they agree to establish, shall not be unlawful under the act to regulate commerce as amended, or under the act approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," or otherwise, if a copy of such agreement is filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission within twenty days after it is made, and before or when any schedule of any rate, fare, or charge, or any classification made pursuant to the agreement is filed with the commission; but all provisions of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and all provisions of this act and any future amendments thereof shall apply to such agreed rates, fares, and charges, and such agreed classifications, and the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have like control over and power of action concerning any agreed rate, fare, charge, or classification.

Under existing law, as construed by our Supreme Court, it is impossible for railroads to get together and make agreements among themselves fixing classifications and rates. In other words, our Supreme Court has held that such an agreement among railroads is a combination in restraint of competition, and that the railroads come under the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. Now, is it not true that the only effect in this section is to allow the railroads to make and file these contracts or agreements in regard to freight classifications without being in violation of the Sherman antitrust law—that it gives them that right, that privilege?

Then, after these agreements are filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, as I understand the Interstate Commerce Commission exercises the same jurisdiction that it exercises at the present time under existing law, what benefit accrues to anybody by virtue of the proposed change, except to exempt the railroads from the Sherman antitrust law in regard to these agreements? What benefit accrues to anybody by reason of this change, except to make lawful these agreements so that they will not be in violation of the Sherman antitrust law? What benefit does the American shipper, in any respect, get by virtue of this change?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is very easy to answer the question propounded by the Senator from Georgia. So far as this section is concerned, the people of the United States are not benefited in any way whatsoever. Its sole effect is to legalize agreements between railroads which the Supreme Court of the United States has already declared are in violation of the antitrust law. It is so distinctively a long step backward in our regulation of corporations, and especially of railroad companies, that it ought to stop and shock any man who has been hitherto in sympathy with the law or laws which Congress has enacted.

I want to be absolutely candid, however, with respect to this matter, and, while what I have said in respect to this section is strictly accurate, it is nevertheless true that there is a succeeding section, to which I shall refer presently, which gives to the commission authority to suspend for a period of sixty days any new rates filed by the railway companies with the commission. Therefore, when these rates, which I have been attempting to describe, are filed with the commission, the commission would have the power to suspend such of them as it thought ought to be suspended for investigation during a period of sixty days. I hope I have made myself wholly clear in answer to the question of the Senator from Georgia.

I return now, however—and it is intimately connected with the inquiry just propounded—to what I was attempting to express when a call of the Senate was ordered. I have referred, I will say for the benefit of those who were out of the Chamber at that time, to the circumstances which must inevitably occur if this law passes. All the railroads of the United States will meet together in their separate territories, through their separate traffic associations, and they will enter into agreements fixing the rates for all the territory of the United States, and not only fixing the rates, but, if we are to be advised by what they have attempted to do in the past, they will confer upon representatives of the traffic associations—I mean boards which are created to carry on the affairs of the traffic associations—the sole power of changing the rates thus agreed upon, so far as the railroads are concerned.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. Allow me just a moment, and I will readily yield. These agreements, with the rates, will be filed in the office of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I was about to say, when I suspended a moment ago, that I would not undertake to fix the number of these rates, but I am far below the figure when I say that there will be more than a million of them filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission in connection with the traffic agreements. I think possibly these rates will number 5,000,000, but I am sure, from the investigations that I have made, that the number will be more than 1,000,000.

What power has the commission over that situation? It has just this power, and no other, that upon the complaint of anyone interested, or upon its own motion, it may proceed to investigate any of these rates; and pending the investigation may suspend any one of them or any number of them for a period not exceeding sixty days. I tell you, and your own common sense will tell you, that within that period the commission can not investigate a negligible proportion of them. It would require the commission five years to investigate these rates and determine whether they are just or unjust. This will be the situation that will confront the people of the United States when you have stifled all competition and destroyed all independence upon the part of the railways by the passage of this bill. I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa has passed from the point in regard to which I desired to ask him a question. I understood the Senator to say that under this provision the railroad companies could not only make an agreement with respect to rates, but they could make an agreement leaving to a board the power to determine whether any rate should be changed in the future. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the language of the provision which seems to carve out from the operation of the antitrust act a certain class of agreements seems to be very specific. It is as follows:

> Agreements between common carriers subject to this act specifying the classifications of freight and the rates, fares—

In other words, the agreements upon which they may enter into, notwithstanding the antitrust act, are simply agreements specifying rates; and, as I understand, they would not have the power to enter into an agreement respecting any other matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if the section can bear the interpretation put upon it by the Senator from Utah, it is vastly worse than I conceived it to be. If it is to be construed as an agreement between the railroads, specifying in terms all the rates which are to be paid by the people of the United States for the shipment of their property and the transportation of their persons, without any ameliorating or mitigating features, then I would have a further objection to it; but I do not so construe it. The agreement prescribed here is a traffic agreement specifying rates and charges. Of course it would be illogical and absurd to authorize the railway companies to enter into an agreement specifying rates unless it was accompanied with a contract and stipulation to preserve those rates, to charge and collect those rates. I take it the Senator from Utah must concede the justice of that reasoning; and if the railways, in specifying their rates, can at the same time agree to preserve those rates, notwithstanding the desire of any railway company to vary or change them, then I assume that we can go one step further without difficulty, which is that the railway companies may delegate to some representative the power to change them. There can not be any flaw in that process of reasoning, and my interpretation of this section must, I think, in the end prevail. I hope that is the interpretation, because, if there could be no departure whatever from the agreement, it would be still more objectionable than though it were accompanied with suitable provisions for changes in rates as the circumstances of the country might require.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May not the provision be interpreted so as to mean that it refers to contracts or agreements made specifying rates? Then, if any change is desired, another agreement shall be made between the same parties and filed. Not that they may confer upon the board or upon the committee the power to make the agreement for them, but they must make it themselves by separate agreement filed as the original agreement was filed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not conceive of such an interpretation, although I can conceive of such a situation; that is, I can not believe that that is the correct interpretation of this section, although, as I have said before, it will be more objectionable to me if it is to be so construed than it is now.

But I recall the Senate to the picture that I have just painted of a million or more rates filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, all of which are to go into effect within the period named in the statute, with no other opportunity upon the part of the commission to interfere with the agreement or change it or approve it in any form whatsoever except to begin an investigation of the rates, a work which, if the commission could devote itself to without any interruption or any diversion on account of its other duties, would require years to perform; and, in the meantime, the American people must pay the rates that are thus established in these agreements and that are prescribed in these schedules.

If you make these agreements subject to the approval of the commission, there will be few of them filed, because the railroads will know that in order to make them effective the commission must investigate and pass upon the rates that are mentioned in them; but if you give the railroads free rein and give them this chance to revise all the rates of the United States without the interference of the antitrust law, and without the possibility of interference upon the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission, then you may expect what I think all of you will concede will happen, namely, after the destruction of all competition, an immediate increase in the rates throughout the United States. I will not say that it was the purpose of this section in the way in which it is drawn. But it is the argument of the railroad companies; that is what they have been contending for for years. They want the menace of the antitrust law removed. They want the shadow of the penalties that are imposed by that act to pass away. They want to deny to the courts the jurisdiction to call them to account for these conspiracies in restraint of trade, and they have accomplished in this section all that they have been contending for, praying for, and fighting for since first Congress attempted to regulate their affairs.

I thought when we closed this discussion yesterday afternoon it was the consensus of opinion that this section was wrong, and that if we did not intend to emasculate and destroy the interstate-commerce law, as well as the antitrust law, it must be changed. I recall the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who never enters the Chamber until I speak his name, and therefore I shall give some attention to him in order that I may give the Senate the benefit of his presence. The Senator from Rhode Island said yesterday that he was not compelled to vote for this bill as it came from the Attorney-General, and that if the interpretation I have put upon this section is the right interpretaion, and if the consequences I have attempted to depict will certainly follow its adoption, then he favors such an amendment to it as would require the approval of the commission before these agreements become effective. Do I correctly quote the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island? His attitude here yesterday afternoon was very different from his attitude at a former time, to which I may refer when he is here.

The amendment I wanted to offer before the committee, and which I was precluded from offering before the committee, the amendment which will bring this section into harmony with the Republican platform, and which will make it consistent with the common welfare, the common interest, and the plain dictates of common justice, I intend to offer now. I must believe that if opportunity had been given to present this matter to the committee much of the discussion we have had up to this time would never have taken place. I have that much confidence in the intelligence and patriotism of the members of that committee. I read from the section in order to show the connection between it and my amendment:

> Agreements between common carriers subject to this act specifying the classifications of freight and the rates, fares, and charges for transportation of passengers and freight which they agree to establish shall not be unlawful under the act to regulate commerce as amended, or under the act approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," or otherwise, if—

Now comes my amendment—

> made in terms subject to the approval of the commission, and if also any such agreement, together with all the rates, fares, charges, or classifications therein prescribed or therein referred to shall be approved by the commission before any such agreement, rates, fares, charges, or classifications go into effect.

If I correctly understood the Senator from Rhode Island yesterday, he seemed to approve of some such change in this bill as I now suggest, and I pass the amendment to the Secretary to be printed and laid on the table, and during the progress of the bill I will offer it.

The amendment is as follows:

> Insert after the word "if," in line 17, page 13, the following:
> "Made in terms subject to the approval of the commission, and if also any such agreement, together with all the rates, fares, charges, or classifications therein prescribed or therein referred to, shall be approved by the commission before any such agreement, rates, fares, charges, or classifications go into effect."
> Strike out the word "a," in line 17, page 13, and insert the words "and a."
> Strike out the word "is," in line 18, page 13, and insert the words "shall be."

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. FLINT. I take it from the amendment the Senator has offered that he is in favor of this provision with the amendment, and I desire to ask him this question: He has stated that the rates which would be filed would number into the millions, in which I agree with him, and that it would be many years before agreements could be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the event that they were all dumped in at one time, as they would be. I ask whether, in his opinion, it would not result that there would be no rates approved under this provision?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope——

Mr. FLINT. Let me finish. For the reason that the minute a rate sheet is offered it will be followed, nine times out of ten, by protests from the shippers; a hearing will take place, and the various rates and classifications and sheets offered will have to be revised. It would seem to me it would be simply an endless task on the part of the commission to take the time to go through and approve the rate sheets. The statement originally made by the Senator, that it would be five years before the commission could investigate the rates, would apply equally to the provision as he now offers it, and for the commission to make an investigation after complaint made.

Mr. CUMMINS. If, under the change I have suggested, the railways were to do what I know they will do if the change is not made, it would require quite the length of time stated by the Senator from California for the commission to investigate all of these rates. But I earnestly and fervently hope if this amendment is made, so that we will be carrying into effect not only the commands of justice but of our platform, that then the railway companies will not enter into agreements with respect to any large proportion of their rates. I can conceive of special instances in which the railway companies might enter into traffic agreements involving some rates, but those must be so few in number and so important in character that the commission, within a reasonable time, could investigate and declare whether they were just or unjust.

Mr. FLINT. As I understand the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr FLINT. Under the provision as written in the bill, he is of opinion that all the rate sheets would be entered into one agreement at one time practically, and that under the amendment as he has offered it there would be comparatively few agreements and rates made by the railroad companies under the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. I so believe, Mr. President. Possibly the Senator from California was not here when I stated what I thought would happen if this section became a part of the law. We have three great zones.

Mr. FLINT. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. If you heard that part of it, then I need not repeat what I said.

I have no doubt whatsoever that within a very short time traffic associations representing these three zones into which the country is naturally divided would file their tariff traffic agreements and specify in them all the rates which the railway companies desire to charge for the transportation of freight and passengers.

Mr. FLINT. That part of it was very clear to me, but the part I wanted the Senator to dwell on to some extent, if he would, is the question just how extensive, in his opinion, would these traffic agreements be under the amendment he has offered. In his opinion, would it be possible to have very many traffic agreements under the bill as proposed to be amended?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not think it would be possible to have many. It would be entirely possible to have traffic agreements covering the more important competitive points. I do not think there ought to be very many, and certainly there ought to be none until approved by the commission. I assume that the railways in these various territories will do just what they have wanted to do heretofore, just what they did do years ago. Their associations are already waiting to be called into action for the purpose of making just such agreements as are provided for in this bill.

I notice now that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] is present.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. If you will just wait a minute, until I finish my suggestion to the Senator from Rhode Island. I took the liberty a few minutes ago of saying that I understood the Senator from Rhode Island to declare yesterday that if the construction of section 7 was anything like the construction that I have been putting upon it, he would willingly concur, in order to put the matter beyond doubt, in an amendment requiring that all such agreements should be approved by the commission before they became effective. I have offered an amendment, the same amendment I sought to offer before the committee, which does put beyond question that important inquiry, and I would be very glad to know the views of the Senator from Rhode Island, so that if he concurs with me in that respect, I can pass on without any further argument to another section of this bill.

Mr. ALDRICH rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. I said yesterday and I repeat that the rates and classifications fixed in these agreements should be subject to the approval and control of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think they clearly are so by the terms of the section as it stands.

There is one trouble with the suggested amendment of the Senator from Iowa. If the commission in advance make an approval, can they afterwards have any jurisdiction over those rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. The act specifically provides that the commission may reconsider its decisions and reform at any time the rates which it has approved.

Mr. ALDRICH. The rates fixed by the agreements certainly ought always to be under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the Senator from Rhode Island about that.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think they are by the terms of the act as it stands. If there is any reasonable question about it, I want them to be made, so far as I am personally concerned, so that they will be under the approval and control of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. It gives me so much assurance with regard to this matter, it is so gratifying to me that the Senator who, without disparaging any other Senator, I believe knows more about this bill than any other man in the Senate except myself [laughter], has assented to the amendment, or the substance of the amendment, which I have offered——

Mr. ALDRICH. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. That I will not further detain the Senate by presenting other suggestions that I may have.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not understand the statement I made yesterday or the statement I make now as assenting to the amendment which the Senator has offered, in the form in which it is offered.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will allow the Senator——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I am sorry the Senator from Iowa does not see that there is a deep and impassable gulf between him and the Senator from Rhode Island, and that is this: The Senator from Rhode Island insists that what the Senator from Iowa contends for is now in the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; I understand that.

Mr. NELSON. And the Senator from Iowa maintains it is not. So there is a big debatable question on which we ought to get instruction.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand perfectly that there is a gulf fixed between the Senator from Rhode Island and myself which may never be bridged. I hope it will be. When it is I am sure he will cross it to my side, for I have no expectation of ever crossing it to his. But we have made a distinct advance when the Senator from Rhode Island admits that these agreements, with the rates specified in them, ought to be approved by the commission before they go into effect.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will not interrupt me until I have finished my answer to the Senator from Minnesota. I am very willing to submit to the Senate the question as to the construction of this section, what it actually means, because there is not a Senator here who, after reading it, will have any doubt whatsoever upon that point, no matter what his opinion may be with regard to the policy of submitting such agreements for approval before they go into effect.

I now yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I felt called upon yesterday to make a protest, as mild as I could make it, against the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Iowa agreeing as to what my views were on this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Texas is not here, and is not involved in the present controversy.

Mr. ALDRICH. No; he is not. But the same thing occurred yesterday.

Mr. BAILEY entered the Chamber.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Texas is now in the Chamber. But I should like to have the opportunity to express my own views in my own way. I have done that. I did not give any such construction to the language which I used or intended to use as that given by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Let me ask again. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether he did not say and whether he does not mean that these agreements must be approved by the commission before they go into effect?

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not say that or intimate that.

Mr. CUMMINS. What does the Senator from Rhode Island mean with regard to that point?

Mr. ALDRICH. I said and I repeat, if it is any satisfaction to the Senator from Iowa——

Mr. CUMMINS. It is a great satisfaction.

Mr. ALDRICH. That these agreements ought to be always under the approval and control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that in my opinion the language in the section as used clearly puts them under that control and subject to that approval.

Mr. CUMMINS. I very much——

Mr. ALDRICH. I further said that if it did not, I was willing that an amendment should be made to that effect. That is all I said.

Mr. CUMMINS. I fear that a night's reflection has wrought a great change in the views of the Senator from Rhode Island. I will leave the Senate, however, to determine at the proper time whether I have correctly understood his remarks upon this subject yesterday and to-day.

I now yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the RECORD will disclose that I made the same statement yesterday in almost precisely the same language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa yields to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator from California called attention to the proposed amendment of the Senator and to the difficulty that would attach under it on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission to pass upon and approve a rate sheet for the entire country.

The question I want to ask is whether or not, under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, there would be any limit as to the time which may be taken by the commission and by the railways to make up a proposed rate sheet for the entire country and have it approved?

Mr. CUMMINS. None whatever.

Mr. CRAWFORD. There would be nothing to prevent them from doing that if it did take five years?

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That was the point.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is my hope that it will eventually be done; that the railways will file their rates with the Interstate Commerce Commission under such an agreement, and that when the commission has investigated those rates and made such changes in them as the interests of the country require they will become the rates of the United States upon which we can depend and rely.

I now pass from this section of the bill. I think I have laid it before the Senate with all the fullness which my capacity enables me to do. I now pass to section 8 of the bill, for I realize that very few of the Senators, with the multitude of other business engagements, have had a chance to become familiar with this measure.

Section 8 of the bill, I am glad to say, is exactly right. This is one of the things for which the people of the country have been asking for years, and I give this section of the bill the same earnest approval as to the former sections of the bill I have given my censure and criticism. The rate sheets of the United States are exceedingly complicated affairs, and there are very few people who are able to take them and determine what is the rate from one point to another. Railway companies, either intentionally or unintentionally, through their agents frequently misstate rates, so that proposed shippers are misled, to their great injury, in entering upon business engagements and making shipments upon the faith of rates that are stated to them by the agents of the railway companies.

It is impossible to impose upon the railway companies any liability whatsoever in favor of the shippers for those mistakes, whether in good faith or otherwise, because the moment you give to a shipper the right to recover from a railway company damages on account of the misstatement of a rate, that moment you have opened the door to general discrimination and rebate, inasmuch as the supposed liability will be at once taken advantage of by the railway companies to give to their favored shippers such discriminations as they might be inclined to give.

Therefore the only way to proceed is to impose such a penalty upon the railways for a misstatement of a rate as will induce the utmost caution. For that reason this section provides that for every misstatement of a rate or a refusal to state a rate, which inflicts injury upon a shipper, the railway company shall incur a penalty of $250, to be recovered by suit of the United States and paid into the Treasury of the United States. I believe it to be not only a wise amendment to our present law, but I believe it to be imperatively demanded for the welfare of the shipper.

I pass to section 9. Section 9 of the bill rewrites section 15 of the present interstate-commerce law. The Senators who were here in 1906 will recall that section 15 of the old law was rewritten at that time, and the present section is a substitute for the section adopted in 1906. You will remember that this is the section which confers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission—I am now speaking of the present law—the power to prescribe a rate for the future. The original law of 1887, which was intended to give the commission that power and which it was supposed for a series of years did give the commission that power, was found to be faulty in 1897, and from 1897 to 1906 it was understood by all the people of the country that the commission had no power to prescribe a rate. Section 15 of the act of 1906 was enacted to give the commission the power, and it did give the power effectively when invoked by a complaint filed with the commission by some shipper or some representative of a shipping interest. What were the defects of that section? It was discovered that it was necessary that the commission, in order to administer justice, should proceed upon its own motion as well as upon a complaint, and therefore in rewriting this section in the present bill it is specifically declared that the commission shall have the authority to proceed against any rate or rates that it may regard as unfair or unreasonable, upon its own motion, and do whatever justice requires with respect to such rates.

I pause here to say that in this enlargement of the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission I am in hearty sympathy. I think it adds to the law one of the most valuable provisions which Congress can possibly add. Further, it adds to the commission the power to deal with classifications, which the commission has not at the present time, and that is a most helpful addition to the law. I not only have no objection to it, but I very freely give it my most hearty support.

It does one more thing. It enlarges the power of the commission with regard to the establishment of through routes. As the law now is, as Senators know, the commission has not the power to establish a through route if there be one satisfactory through route in existence, whether established by the commission or whether established by the railroads. Our experience since 1906 has shown, and shows conclusively, that there is great advantage in more than one through route. Therefore in rewriting section 15 of the bill the additional power is conferred upon the commission to establish such through routes as in its judgment the business of the country demands.

That was the bill as it was reported by the supervisory committee which assembled in New York in August of last year. In that draft, and I have it before me, absolute authority was given to the commission to establish through routes, and there was no limitation whatsoever. Between the time that this bill came under the consideration of the President and the Attorney-General on the 10th of November and the time at which it came into the Senate on the 11th of January of the present year, this provision was very markedly changed.

The bill as it was introduced here provided that the commission should not have the power to establish a through route between a steam railroad and an electric railroad, one of the most odious exceptions that can possibly be imagined, because the growth of transportation facilities in this country in the future is to be, as many believe, largely in the development of electric power. The result would have been to give the steam railroads the power to crush the electric railroads and to buy them at their own price, a result that was still further effectuated by a subsequent provision of the bill, to which I shall call your attention, which excepted electric railroads from the prohibition against a combination, merger, or consolidation of railway properties.

The electric roads heard of this provision when it was introduced by the Senator from West Virginia, and they made so much noise and presented so many just complaints that those who were in charge of the bill found it impossible to withstand their attack upon it. Therefore, while the bill was in the committee, it was changed, not by the committee, but by the Attorney-General; and now the bill does permit the commission to establish a through route as between an electric freight road or an electric road that is engaged in the business of transporting freight and the ordinary steam commercial railway.

I want to applaud that change. I think it was one of the most signal instances I have ever known of an officer yielding to a just and imperious demand upon the part of those who were interested in the subject. Again, although this draft which I hold in my hand contained no such provision, the bill that was introduced by the Senator from West Virginia contained a provision that in establishing any through route the commission could not compel any railroad to become a part of a through route unless the through route embodied substantially the entire line of the railway, a provision that simply robbed the measure of nearly all its value, because there are so many instances in which it is necessary that a through route shall be established over a railway without including its entire length that the commonest and most casual investigation of the subject must necessarily lead to the condemnation of any such proposition.

Again the voice of the people was heard distinctly enough, and I think I could locate the voice if I were permitted to do so. When it is heard from its seat it is not far from me as I stand here. I think you will all recognize that the interests, especially of the Pacific coast, rose up in rebellion against a proposal that no through route could be established from California to the eastern markets unless it embraced the whole line of any railway that became a part of it.

I applaud that change. I think it was most wise. And with that change, so far as this part of the section is concerned, I have no amendment to offer and I have nothing but praise to bestow.

But now we come to a new part of the new section 15, which, I think, will interest the Senate. I mean section 15 of the old bill. It is section 9 of the present bill.

I omitted to say that there was one change in the part I have been describing that I will ask the Senate at some future time to consider, but I do not intend to examine its merits now. I intend, when the hour comes for considering amendments, to ask the Senate to broaden the power of the commission, so that in its investigation of rates it may determine and fix a relation between rates, as well as to prescribe a maximum rate.

I pass to the Secretary my amendment in that regard and ask that it be printed and lie on the table, to be hereafter offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

The amendment is as follows:

Insert, after the word "charged," in line 5, page 17, the words "or to determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable relation between such rates or charges to be thereafter observed;" also insert, after the word "prescribed," in line 14, page 17, the words "and preserve the relation so fixed."

Mr. CUMMINS. I now reach the second paragraph of section 9, which becomes a part of section 15 if it shall be adopted, and inasmuch as this section has been the subject of so much discussion, not only in Washington, but elsewhere, I will take the privilege of reading it. I am now reading from page 18 of the bill under consideration.

First, let me say that I suppose there has been nothing discussed more critically, no complaint urged more emphatically since the passage of the Hepburn law, than the appeal on the part of the shippers that no increase in rates shall go into effect unless the increase is first approved by the commission. I know that I need not enlarge upon that question. All the business men here know how important it is that freight rates shall not be suddenly increased. There is nothing that disturbs the business man more than an increase in rates upon material or commodities that he has already agreed to sell at a certain price. Therefore the demand has been continuous, and has been consistent, and has been persistent, that Congress shall give to the commission the power to suspend any proposed increase in the rates until their justice can be investigated and passed upon.

Now, that is just what was done in the bill, or in the draft of the bill, to which I referred a few moments ago. I shall not read it, but it provided that when any new rates were filed with the commission, the commission, either upon its own motion or upon the complaint of any shipper, could suspend those rates until an investigation was had and their justice determined, and then if found to be fair and just they might go into effect.

Let us see what sort of a bill we have before us now on that question:

Whenever there shall be filed with the commission any schedule stating a new individual or joint rate, fare, or charge, or any new individual or joint classification, or any new individual or joint regulation or practice affecting any rate, fare, or charge, the commission shall have, and it is hereby given, authority, either upon complaint or upon its own initiative without complaint, at once, and if it so orders, without answer or other formal pleading by the interested carrier or carriers, but upon reasonable notice, to enter upon a hearing concerning the propriety of such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice; and pending such hearing and the decision thereon the commission, upon filing with such schedule and delivering to the carrier or carriers affected thereby a statement in writing of its reasons for such suspension, may suspend the operation of such schedule and defer the use of such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice, but not for a longer period than sixty days beyond the time when such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice would otherwise go into effect.

That is the part of this section that has come into it since it was originally devised. That is the part which robs it of all, or substantially all, its value, for it is in the power of the railway companies to render an investigation on the part of the commission impossible within the period of sixty days.

I know that I need not recount the obstacles in the volume of the business, in the complexity of affairs, in order to convince you all that if the railways file a tithe of the changes in rates after this law goes into effect that they filed last year the commission could not investigate 5 per cent of those rates within the period of sixty days which are here given for that purpose. The people have been asking for bread and this bill proposes to give them a stone, so far as protecting them from the injustice of increased rates upon the part of the railway companies is concerned.

My proposition is that such rates shall not go into effect until the commission has had an opportunity to examine them and to declare whether they are just or unjust. That has been the view heretofore held. It may be assumed that the railways having fixed their own rates have fixed them fairly and reasonably from their own standpoint. Therefore is it not fair to say that when a railway proposes to increase its rate it shall be able to give some reason to the people and some reason to the commission for increasing a rate that it itself has declared to be fair and reasonable?

This view, however, is one that I simply echo, because, fortunately, I can summon to my aid the same high authority for the amendment that I propose to offer to this section that I summoned to sustain the amendment I offered with regard to the section which permits railway-traffic agreements to go into effect without the approval of the commission.

At this point, therefore, I beg leave to read, if I have the extract here, and I think I have, the words of our President, and, if it is found, after I have read them, that I have been guilty of plagiary in the argument I have just made, I trust I will be excused, because I have read and reread this paper so often that it has become a part of my own thought. This is a quotation from the speech of Hon. William Howard Taft, President of the United States, made at Des Moines, Iowa, Monday, September 20, 1909. He said:

Under the interstate-commerce law a new rate classification is to be filed with the commission. It is proposed now to authorize the commission to postpone the date that such new rate classification is to take effect, provided that within thirty days of the date of the order a complaint be filed that such rate or classification is unreasonable or unjust, or, provided second, that the commission itself shall institute an inquiry into the reasonableness or justice of such rate or classification. This introduces a somewhat new element into the act by placing the railroad company in the situation, when it proposes to make a change in the rate which is an advance, that it should be prepared to show to the commission affirmatively that the change to the new rate is justified. I am inclined to think that this is a fair change in the provisions of the law. It gives to the public the same right to have changes which affect them injuriously investigated before they go into effect as it does changes of rates by the railroad by appeal to the courts to have the order of the commission subjected to investigation and hearing. Railroads ought not to be permitted to change rates unless they can give a reason for it.

I respectfully commend this view of the matter, which is in exact accordance with the original draft of this measure, to those who are responsible for the bill as it now is before the Senate, which limits the power of the commission in this respect to sixty days, and the result of which must be that the vast proportion of the increases in rates which are filed with the commission will go into effect without any inquiry or investigation whatsoever. I have simply echoed the opinion of the President of the United States, and I earnestly hope that it will be as persuasive as later expressions seem to have been.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What does the Senator mean by the original draft of the bill? I do not quite understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am told, Mr. President, that the gentlemen whom I named day before yesterday met in New York—I have no hesitation in naming them because I am simply stating what everybody knows, what the newspapers have stated over and over again, and I suppose that whatever is generally known may be assumed to be known by the Senate—met in New York on the 30th day of August, 1909—the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, two members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and a Member of the House of Representatives—to put in the form of a draft of a bill the views which the President of the United States had expressed at various times regarding amendments to the interstate commerce law. It is the draft which those gentlemen prepared and submitted for consideration, the terms of which have all been published, I believe, in the newspapers to which I refer when I say the original draft.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator has a copy of it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have a copy of it in my hand. I now show it, and I want to read, insomuch as it has been called to my attention, what was said on this subject.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator permit me, so that I may understand him?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That does not refer to any bill which has been introduced here?

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The bill that was originally introduced by the Senator from West Virginia and the bill reported from the committee, in the respect in which the Senator is now discussing it, are identical.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; they are, so far as this question is concerned.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So far as the limitation of sixty days is concerned?

Mr. CUMMINS. They are; but I was simply showing the evolution of this subject. Inasmuch as it has been under public discussion, I will read what these gentlemen submitted to those who were considering the matter. This is the clause which the railway companies especially attacked, and, apparently, with great success.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. As I understand the Senator, a self-appointed committee, or a committee appointed by the President for that purpose, undertook to prepare a draft of a bill and submit it to the President. That draft, I understand, was submitted to a number of gentlemen. I think the Senator from Iowa was one of them. I have no doubt that the arguments used by the Senator from Iowa and the other gentlemen to whom the draft was submitted led to changes. I do not know whether this change was suggested by the Senator from Iowa or not. I presume that it was not, from the fact that he is now opposing it. I think that is the history of the preparation of this legislation.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may be tempted before I am through to disclose what little I had to do with it, but I think the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] can well assume that I did not propose the change which is manifest between the original draft and the present bill. The President had declared the proposition so clearly and so satisfactorily to the people of the country, that I would not have had the courage, even had I had the inclination, to suggest the change that was afterwards made.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. Perhaps the Senator from Iowa will be kind enough to inform the Senate why he picks out one or two utterances of the President upon various things connected with this bill and considers them of high authority here, but rejects the main scheme of the bill, which embodies the ideas of the President generally.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, Mr. President, if the Senator from Rhode Island had been here listening to me, he would have heard me express in the most positive and emphatic manner, not only my approval, but my praise of certain portions of this bill. I am here with the hope that we may preserve what is good in the bill and reject what is bad.

Mr. BAILEY. Vain hope! [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I do not think it is a vain hope. I have gone far already toward convincing the Senator from Rhode Island; and when one can convince the Senator from Rhode Island, there is hope for anybody else on earth. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I have listened whenever I have been able to, and I have read the Senator's statements from time to time, and, so far as I can observe, the enacting clause is the only part of the bill which meets with the approval of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. That simply illustrates what I said a moment ago, that the Senator has either had cotton in his ears while I have been talking here, or he was not in the Chamber, because I said in the most unequivocal way, and I repeat, that there are many things in this bill that are good. I have pointed out several of them, and I shall point out others before I am through; but because I find some things that are good in a bill it does not incline me to accept those things that are bad in the same bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. Simply, as a friend of the court, I want to warn the Senator from Iowa against laying to his soul the flattering unction that he has persuaded or convinced the Senator from Rhode Island of anything. [Laughter.]

If the Senator from Iowa doubts the correctness of my judgment, I will ask him to wait until the roll is called and he will find out whether the Senator from Rhode Island agrees with him or not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have too high a regard for the intellectual keenness of the Senator from Texas to follow the practice of an ancient artist and label my pictures or specify when I attempt to perpetrate a joke. [Laughter.]

This was the original proposition:

[Extract from document prepared "For the confidential use of the President," pages 21 and 22.]

Whenever there shall be filed with the commission any schedule stating a new individual or joint rate, fare, or charge, or any new individual or joint classification, or any new individual or joint regulation or practice affecting any rate, fare, or charge, the commission shall have, and it is hereby given, authority, either upon complaint or upon its own initiative without complaint, to suspend the operation of such schedule and defer the use of any such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice pending investigation of the legality and propriety thereof; and after full hearing the commission may make such order with reference to said proposed rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice as would be proper if the rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice had actually gone into effect.

Now, will you tell me what is wrong with that proposition? The people generally insisted upon an absolute prohibition against any rate going into effect without an examination upon the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but they became finally satisfied with the suggestion that if the commission were given the power to suspend any new rate so filed until an investigation could be had and discovery made as to its justice or fairness, that might accomplish the purpose. We have not only been refused the original demand, but now the proposition, which illustrates the extreme limit to which we could go and still preserve the right of the shipper, has given place to a proposition that keeps the promise to the ear but will break it to the hope, because the commission can not investigate any great proportion of the changes which the railway companies can make and will make within a period of sixty days.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator from Iowa will not undertake to say that what he calls the original draft in this case ever met with the full approval of the President?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have just read—which the Senator from Rhode Island evidently did not hear—the most explicit statement from the President of the United States that could be put into the English language, which declared that these rates ought not to go into effect until they had been investigated and approved by the commission.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the Senator from Iowa read from a statement made in Des Moines.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did.

Mr. ALDRICH. After this first draft was submitted to the President, the President and the Attorney-General, as I understand it—for as long as we are going into the history of this case we might as well be explicit—heard a number of gentlemen representing all phases of this subject, of whom the Senator from Iowa was one, and the President did not approve this legislation or the form of the legislation until a long time subsequent to that period.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Rhode Island has in every respect except one stated it accurately. The President, as I understand, was on the 10th of November in favor of that proposition. After hearing from those who were against that proposition, it is fair to assume that he now sanctions the provision which is in this bill; but I do not want the Senator from Rhode Island to mention again, unless he wants a full explanation from me, any conference had with me upon this bill. I do not want to enter upon it. I think the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] can recall it, and I believe I would be willing to rely upon the fidelity of his memory to recount it. All of it I remember is that the Senator from West Virginia wanted to know of me if he could compel trunk lines to furnish coal roads with equipment. [Laughter.] We had some discussion upon that subject, and that is about all that I remember of that conference.

Mr. ELKINS. I will say to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. Senators desiring to interrupt must address the Chair.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, as one seeking light——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please be in order. Senators desiring to interrupt will please address the Chair.

Mr. BAILEY. I did address the Chair, if the Chair please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not recognize the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. I can address the Chair, even if I am not fortunate enough to obtain the Chair's recognition, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CUMMINS. With pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I merely want to say that, as one seeking light on this subject, I should be delighted to hear about this conference that has occurred somewhere, I take it at the White House. I think it would enable us to make the distinction between "before and after taking." [Laughter.]

The President's opinions, if we are to believe what we have heard—and I do believe it—have undergone some change. I understand there was a conference somewhere and at some time. Of course I understand that conference does not concern the Senators on this side of the Chamber, but, being referred to in the open Chamber, it would instruct us to hear about that conference, and, having a curious mind, I myself would like to know who was there. Of course I know that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] was there looking after the special interests of West Virginia in the distribution of coal cars [laughter]—a very proper thing for him to do—and, of course, I know that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] was there. I am not so sure whether or not the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] was there.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was not there and was not invited.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at that time. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALDRICH. Nor at any other time with the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, even under the rather tempting suggestion of the Senator from Texas, I must be silent with regard to that conference. I never recall painful memories if I can avoid it.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from West Virginia wants to verify that old adage that runs—well, he knows how it runs [laughter]—I will yield.

Mr. ELKINS. All I have to say about the conference is that we can not allow even the Senator from Texas to get in the Republican party by the back door in the way he suggests. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. If I were going into the Republican party, I would hunt the back door. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINS. I now pass that section. I had intended to offer an amendment to it, but I can not turn to that portion of the report which contains it, and therefore I will return to the subject at some future time, simply to offer an amendment which will strike out the limitation of sixty days and restore the bill to the form in which I believe it ought to be, giving the commission the authority to suspend the rates and to keep them in suspension until they are examined and found to be just, fair, and reasonable.

The fifth paragraph of this section—and now I am sure the Senator from Rhode Island will hear what I have to say—the last paragraph of this section, gives to the shipper the right to route his freight if there are two or more joint or through routes open between the points of carriage. This is also a privilege which the shippers of the country have earnestly asked of Congress more than once. It is granted in this bill, and it is a most wise provision, and I approve it just as heartily as I condemned a few moments ago the provision which I was then discussing. I trust it may remain a part of this bill when it finally passes the Senate.

I come now to section 10 of the bill. Section 10 of this bill repeals a large part of section 16 of the existing interstate-commerce law, and it does so because the part of the section so repealed relates to suits brought against the Interstate Commerce Commission to set aside, annul, or suspend an order. That subject is fully dealt with in the first six sections of the bill, by which that jurisdiction is transferred to the proposed court of commerce. If those who are opposed to the court of commerce and opposed to this new jurisdiction on its part are successful, then I take it for granted that the eliminated portions of section 16 will be restored; but if I am not successful in inducing the Senate to accept these amendments, then the provisions here found will be quite in harmony with the remainder of the bill.

Section 11 of the bill I need not read. It is a reenactment, with some slight changes, of a portion of section 20 of the existing law. That section relates to reports which are to be filed by the railroad companies with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The changes are entirely right and everybody will concur in them. I have no suggestion to make with regard to the section, nor does the minority report condemn it in anywise.

[At this point Mr. CUMMINS yielded the floor for the day.]

Friday, March 18, 1910.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in my consideration of this bill, I have now reached section 12. It deals with the consolidation, combination, and merger of railroads. Its avowed purpose, and I use the word "avowed" deliberately, is to prohibit certain combinations, consolidations, and mergers of railroad properties that are not prohibited by the antitrust law. In other words, its purpose, as declared by its author, is to strengthen the antitrust law in its application to railroads. With that purpose I am in perfect sympathy, but it is my reflective judgment, and it has been reached after much study and the most careful investigation, that the section, instead of strengthening the antitrust law in its application to railroads, weakens that law, and it will validate or may validate many transactions that are now condemned by the antitrust law. I intend to pass through this section, calling specifically to the attention of Senators just what it accomplishes.

The first significant feature of the section is that it is limited to railroads. The interstate-commerce law, as all Senators know, in all, I believe, its other provisions is applicable to common carriers as defined in the first section of the bill. This section, for a reason of which I am in utter ignorance, eliminates all common carriers except railroads.

This objection alone, as it seems to me, must condemn the section in its present form. It is impossible to conceive any reason for strengthening the interstate-commerce law or strengthening the antitrust law with regard to railroads that does not apply with equal force to every other kind of common carrier. There are steamboat lines, steamship lines, water lines of all kinds; there are express companies, and other organizations, which fall within the law concerning which it is just as necessary to protect the people against combinations as it is to protect them against the action of railroad companies.

In so far as this section is concerned, it would be entirely lawful for a railroad company to purchase and combine with itself all the steamship lines, either interior or exterior to the United States. We have been waiting with some solicitude for the completion of the Panama Canal, hoping that when that great work shall have been finished there will be the opportunity for competition between the eastern and western borders of our country through the medium of steamship lines; but what will be the result if that competition is permitted to be destroyed by a combination between such water lines and the transcontinental railway lines? We are only compelled to look at the present situation in order to know that the condition I have just mentioned is not only possible but probable.

When we are attempting to preserve competition among railways or among common carriers, it is of the highest necessity that in any prohibition against merger or the acquisition on the part of one common carrier of the lines of another the prohibition shall extend to water transportation as well as to land transportation.

Now, I do not forget that there will still rest upon that subject the antitrust law. I am speaking only of the prohibition of this particular section.

It is also to be noted that this section expressly excepts electric railways. Why, I do not know. I hope the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee will soon be here, in order that he may be able to answer that question, or at least take such note of it as will enable him to answer it at some future time. So far as this section is concerned, one electric railway could purchase all the steam railways in the United States and combine them into a single corporation, and in that manner destroy all the competition that we now enjoy. I do not see that under all the laws of the United States that would be possible, for so far as this section is concerned and the point I have just made is concerned, the antitrust law will still be in effect; but we are engaged here in attempting to strengthen the antitrust law. That is the declaration of those who are responsible for this section, and yet, not inadvertently but designedly, it opens the most favorable opportunity that can be imagined for the combination of any system of railways that promoters may desire to bring together in one management through the medium of an electric railway.

I notice that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] is looking with some surprise at that statement, and I do not wonder, because his is one of the States in which the electric railways have been developed to an extent not seen, probably, in any other. If he will apply this section to his own Commonwealth, he will find that if it were so desired the entire railway system of Indiana could be combined and put into a single board of directors through the medium of one of these electric railways.

Mr. SHIVELY. Without relation to the state laws?

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg your pardon, Mr. President, I do not say that. I leave it for others to determine what effect this would have upon the laws of the States forbidding concentration or consolidations. I do not attempt to say at this time. However, it will be discussed fully at a later time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRISTOW in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether he does not think that the economic development of our railway systems requires large powers of consolidation, and that if the Interstate Commerce Commission is given the regulation and control of the method of combination so as to exclude undesirable combinations, it is not a wise thing to encourage combinations?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I answer that by asking a return question? Is the Senator from Nevada in favor of the provision which I have just been discussing?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I must confess that I am not sufficiently familiar with it to express an opinion. As the Senator from Iowa well knows, the bill was presented to the committee upon the very day it was reported out, and no time was afforded for a consideration of the bill. I have not been able to take it up since. I was simply addressing myself to the Senator's general remarks regarding consolidation; and unfortunately I only caught his remarks for a few seconds. I wished to develop the Senator's ideas with reference to the correct method of facilitating the combination of railways as a part of the economic development of the transportation of the country.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I did not intend at just this moment to express my views upon that broad and comprehensive subject, but I am quite willing to turn aside for a moment and do so. I have no objection to the consolidation of lines which form a continuous route of transportation. They are not competing lines in any sense. I have no objection to the consolidation of lines of railway that will extend one system from New York to San Francisco with continuous facilities for shipment. I have the greatest objection, however, to the consolidation of competing lines of railway, or, as we ordinarily express it and as the States have expressed it in their legislation, "parallel and competing lines of railway." We are dealing in this section, not with the consolidations which extend the lines of railroads, but we are dealing with consolidations which merge competing lines of road, and there is an attempted prohibition here against the acquisition by one railroad of another, which is, as it is said in the proposed law, directly competitive.

I was remarking that in the prohibition, for some reason unknown to me, the electric railways are excluded; so that, so far as this bill is concerned, I can organize an electric railway 100 miles in length or 10 miles in length, and with that corporation buy all the railroads in the United States whether they are parallel, competing, or otherwise. My suggestion, of course, is that this prohibition shall extend to all common carriers, in order that we may accomplish the purpose that we have in view.

The next suggestion I have to make with regard to this section is this: The prohibition is against one railroad company acquiring—

> Directly or indirectly, any interest of whatsoever kind in the capital stock, or purchase or lease the railroad, of any railroad corporation owning or operating a line of railroad which is directly and substantially competitive with that of such first-named corporation—

And so forth.

I should like for some Senator, before we have finished this debate, to give us some information with regard to the meaning of the words "directly competitive." In so far as my observation has gone, this is the first time that the word "direct" has ever been applied to qualify the word "competition" in any law which is designed to preserve competition.

The chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee [Mr. ELKINS] is now here, and therefore I repeat what I have just said. The acquisition by one railroad company of another is prohibited in this section only when the latter is directly competitive with the former. What does the word "directly" mean in that connection? What is "direct competition" as distinguished from "indirect competition?" I hope the Senator from West Virginia will, before this debate is closed, give us some instances that would be controlled by this provision that are not now controlled by the antitrust law.

Is the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad in direct competition with the Pennsylvania Central Railroad? Is a railroad running from New York to St. Louis in direct competition with a railroad running from New York to Chicago? Is a railroad running from Chicago to Omaha in direct competition with a railroad running from Chicago to Kansas City? Are you intending to confine the operation of this section to those railroads which begin at a common point and which end at a common point? I await with a good deal of interest and a good deal of impatience, too, some information upon that subject, and I hope that the defender of this section, if it has a defender—it has not transpired yet that it has—but if it has I want particularly to know what the words "directly competitive" mean in drawing into their operation any instances that are not already controlled by the interstate-commerce law.

We are proceeding upon the hypothesis that we have the antitrust law which prohibits or makes unlawful contracts, combinations, and conspiracies in restraint of trade. We are trying to add something to that prohibition in this law. At least it has been so declared. Now, when you qualify the word "competition," as it is qualified here, tell me what instance you will be able to find that will be forbidden in this section that is not already forbidden by the antitrust law?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think that a close analysis of the testimony of Mr. Walker, I think it was, who appeared before the Interstate Commerce Committee, will disclose that, if Mr. Walker was correct in what he conceived to be "indirect competition" and "direct competition," there would not be over two or three railroads in the United States that would be prohibited from acquiring stock under this law. The testimony of Mr. Walker, I think, reveals very thoroughly the difference between "indirectly" and "directly competitive roads," and it would leave only two or three at most, according to his idea, that would come within the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator from Idaho. I was about to trace the development of this peculiar idea from the beginning of this proposed legislation to the present time, and in the course of that development the suggestions of Mr. Walker play an important part. I do not know what "directly competitive" means. I know what Mr. Walker, the general counsel for the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway thought they meant, but they are new words, so far as the laws of the country are concerned, and we are entering upon a somewhat uncertain enterprise, I think, when we employ them.

Now, will the Senate just follow me a moment until we see how these words came into the bill as they are now seen. The original draft, to which I referred yesterday, dealt with this question in quite a different way, and I intend to read again from that draft, in order that the Senate may know how the matter impressed the men as they originally dealt with it. That draft reads:

> No corporation or joint-stock company or association which is a common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, shall hereafter acquire, directly or indirectly, any interest of whatsoever kind in any capital stock of any corporation or joint-stock company or association which competes or is naturally competitive anywhere in any way with such first-named corporation or joint-stock company or association in any part of its business to which said act to regulate commerce, as amended, applies.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, from what does the Senator now read? Is that the original act?

Mr. CUMMINS. I read from the draft of the bill prepared by these eminent gentlemen, who met in New York in August of last year, who met there to put the views of the President on this subject in the form of a bill, and who afterwards reported to the President and the Attorney-General the bill that I have now in my hand and from which I have just read. Remember what that is. That meant something. There is no difficulty about understanding what combinations and mergers were forbidden by that language.

I now turn to the original bill as introduced by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I am glad to do this, inasmuch as the Senator from West Virginia has in substance disavowed the bill as it now is. I want to show that the bill as he introduced it, and for which he became responsible, is entirely unlike the one we are now considering.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ELKINS. I should like to have the Senator now explain what he means by my disavowing the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is merely a conclusion from what the Senator has said.

Mr. ELKINS. When and where?

Mr. CUMMINS. Many times, and always in the Senate.

Mr. ELKINS. Oh, no. I have not said anything—I think the Senator's memory is at fault—that would indicate that I disavowed this bill. If I had, I should not have introduced it, I should not have reported it, and I would not stand here and defend it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think my conclusion will have to stand until the Senator from West Virginia says something for the bill.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Iowa will allow me to interrupt him further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, in the progress of this debate I propose to show what I think of this bill and to defend its provisions. That is my purpose before we get through with the debate. I thought it was courteous and polite to the Senator from Iowa to have him speak first in opposition to the bill; but there is one thing I was glad to hear the Senator say yesterday, and that was that there was a great deal of good in the bill, to which he heartily subscribed and which he pointed out. We put in one section that he helped to frame, and I think he himself controlled it. I am not going to disavow anything that the Senator helped to make and of which he is father.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I feel very grateful to the Senator from West Virginia for permitting me to begin this debate; but, nevertheless, he will remember that I urged upon him with all the power I had and all the earnestness I could command that he open this debate himself, so that we might know what was to be said for the bill before we listened to that which is to be said against it.

I recall to the Senate again the language of the original draft:

> Which competes or is naturally competitive anywhere in any way with such first-named corporation—
> And so forth.

Now, mark the bill as it came into the Senate on that point:

> Shall hereafter acquire, directly or indirectly, any interest of whatsoever kind in the capital stock, or purchase or lease the railroad, of any railroad corporation which competes with such first-named corporation.

There is some change, but I assume only in emphasis. The language is still broad and sweeping and comprehensive. The prohibition is against the acquisition of any railroad which competes with the "first-named railroad." There was omitted between the time this draft was prepared and the time the Senator from West Virginia introduced the bill into the Senate the words "naturally competitive" and the words "anywhere in any way." Evidently it was thought that entirely too much stress and emphasis might be put upon those words; and therefore they were omitted. Nevertheless, I would not have seriously disagreed with the Senator from West Virginia if the words that were originally used were still in the bill; but unfortunately we now have the prohibition against acquiring—> directly or indirectly, any interest of whatsoever kind in the capital stock, or purchase or lease the railroad, of any railroad corporation owning or operating a line of railroad which is directly and substantially competitive with that of such first-named corporation.

There must have been some reason for the limitation which is found in this bill; there must have been some reason for the change of phraseology that I have pointed out. I want to know what that reason is. If we had the man here who drew the bill we might know what the reason is for the change; but I doubt very much whether the Senator from West Virginia knows why these changes were made. If he does, I should be very glad to hear what they are.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think he was present in the committee during the discussion when this change was made and the reasons for it were given. Was he not?

Mr. CUMMINS. There was some discussion, but very little, on that particular point.

Mr. ELKINS. It was held there that in a certain sense every railroad in the United States competes with other railroads; that they are all competitive in a sense; and that the original wording would not have carried out the intention and purpose of the section. Therefore it was modified so that the prohibition would be against acquiring a railroad which is "directly and substantially competitive." That was the reason; and I think the Senator was present when it was given. That was all that was said about it. I supposed that the committee had agreed that the change should be made.

Mr. CUMMINS. The sense of the committee was never taken upon it; it was never submitted either for consideration or for a vote. I assert with a good deal of confidence that the language now used in the bill does not broaden a single whit the operation of the antitrust law and that every acquisition which is forbidden by these words as they now are has been forbidden for twenty years by the antitrust law.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CLAY. If I understood the Senator correctly, this bill was never discussed in the committee or amended in the committee. I understood the Senator to say that the original draft, from which he read a few moments ago, was drawn in New York, and then the Senator from West Virginia, the chairman of the committee, introduced a bill and it was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Then a substitute for that bill was afterwards drawn by the Attorney-General and adopted by that committee as it came from the Attorney-General; that in fact the Committee on Interstate Commerce has never amended the bill in any particular; that at first the Attorney-General drew a bill on one line, which was introduced by the Senator from West Virginia, and then drew the bill we are now considering, and that that bill came from the Committee on Interstate Commerce without a single line of it being changed or discussed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia has stated the case with substantial accuracy; but he must remember that I am not now criticising the conduct of the Interstate Commerce Committee or the history of this bill. I am opposed to these words, and I use the history simply for the purpose of showing that they have been adopted in order to meet the objections of the railroad companies who desire the opportunity to combine and consolidate and merge to the full extent that they now have the opportunity of doing under the antitrust law. It seems to me that when I show these changes from time to time, I at least furnish a foundation for the demand that some reason be given for inserting them into the bill.

I desire, in order to show that there is no real virtue in this prohibition, to read a paragraph from the Northern Securities case. Senators will remember that this case arose first through the purchase on the part of the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad, and then by the combination of the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern in the Northern Securities Company. The legality of that merger was questioned in what is probably the most famous case that has arisen under the antitrust law. I shall read but a single paragraph of it. It is found in One hundred and ninety-third United States Reports, on page 331:

> That every combination or conspiracy which would extinguish competition between otherwise competing railroads engaged in interstate trade or commerce and which would in that way restrain such trade or commerce is made illegal by the act.

I should like somebody to tell me—and I hope the Senator from West Virginia will do it, and I ask the question in all good faith—what case has he in mind that will be covered by this prohibition that is not already covered by the antitrust law?

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. The reason for this language is as I have stated. I do not think Congress ought to put beyond the power of a railroad running at right angles with another road the right to purchase stock in that road, although there might be the slightest kind of competition. In the case of roads running at certain angles until they join and make a continuous line, I do not think the acquiring of one road by the other would be a consolidation or a combination in restraint of trade at all. Competition is so slight in respect to many of these roads that you can hardly define it, but there is a certain competition. The merger of railroads in a certain sense has not been injurious to the public interest nor in restraint of competition. It has been looked upon as a great blessing to the country. Take the Southern Railroad, for instance. It has 6,000 miles, penetrating the whole South. It has been formed largely by consolidation, and has resulted in good; but under this bill, if drawn in the way the Senator insists it should be drawn, the Southern could not have acquired these lines. That is the situation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia is not answering my question. The Senator is a lawyer, and a good one, and a man of wide observation. I have just read a paragraph from the Northern Securities case which contains the real heart of the decision, and my question is, What combination or merger of railroads will be forbidden by the section that we have now under consideration that is not forbidden by the antitrust law? And if there is no such case, why did he put in the prohibition?

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, after reading that decision I will answer the Senator's question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the real truth is that we have reduced this very worthy and laudable attempt in the beginning to a point where it is practically the same as the prohibition of the antitrust law, and the antitrust law applies to all common carriers and not to railroads alone.

I pass now to the next provision of the section. I have given you the prohibition; I now come to the exceptions. The first exception is:

> Provided, however, That nothing in this section contained shall operate to prevent any such corporation which at the date of the passage of this act owns not less than one-half of the entire issued and outstanding capital stock of any other railroad corporation from acquiring any of the remainder of such stock—

Personally I have no objection to that part of the section. In the original draft it read "80 per cent" instead of "50 per cent." If we are to legalize certain combinations of railroads and are not to make the statute retroactive, then I can see no serious objection to allowing a railroad that has 50 per cent of the stock of another to have the remainder, because no additional control or management will be conferred by the acquisition of the additional stock. That was the exception, and the only exception, when these gentlemen completed their labors in nor to prevent any such corporation which is now operating under lease, made for not less than twenty years, a railroad of any other such corporation from renewing such lease or acquiring the reversionary ownership of the lessor railroad, either directly or through purchases of the stock of the lessor company.

New York, but now we find in the bill some exceptions to which I have the most serious objection—

Mr. President, that simply destroys the policy of the whole bill. I am not here to contend that we ought to return to former times and to overturn all the transactions that have taken place under laws as they have been and reduce to their integral elements all the combinations that have been made in the last twenty years—I am not contending for that.

But we are establishing here a policy which declares that competing railroads ought not to be consolidated; that it is not well for the people of the United States that competition should be extinguished. Out of tenderness to interests that have already been created we allow leases that are in existence to continue until by their terms they expire.

But I should like to know from the Senator from West Virginia why, if it is against the policy of the country to permit consolidations of this character, there should be a renewal of the lease at its expiration, thereby authorizing, validating, and continuing the very evil which we are endeavoring to correct? Tell me why, at the expiration of any such lease, the lessee railroad should be permitted to buy the reversionary interest of the lessor. No rights have been acquired under the faith of a renewal of such lease; no interests have become established by reason of a hope that the reversionary interest in the railroad might be bought by the lessee; and if we honestly believe that it is and should be the policy of the United States to prevent consolidations of this character, then at the expiration of these leases, and after all the parties have enjoyed all the rights which they bestow, the law ought to prohibit the consolidation through a renewal of the lease or through a purchase of the reversionary interest. This seems to me so clear that I need not further pursue the subject.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to return for just a moment to a former part of the discussion on section 12. In tracing the evolution of the bill, referring to the first bill that was introduced, it provided that railroad corporations should not acquire any interest in any other railroad corporation which competed. That would seem to prevent a railroad company from acquiring an interest in other railroad companies, however slight the competition might be.

Let me put this illustration to the Senator: Here is a railway corporation which owns a line of road running from Chicago to the city of Denver, we will say, or, rather, from the city of Chicago to the town of Colorado Springs, in Colorado, which is some 50 or 60 miles beyond Denver. Here is another railroad corporation—I am stating an actual case—which owns a line of railroad running from the city of Denver through the town of Colorado Springs to Salt Lake City. Under the first draft of this bill introduced, would it be the Senator's opinion that the owner of a railroad from Chicago to Colorado Springs would be prevented from obtaining ownership of or interest in a railroad running from Denver through Colorado Springs to Salt Lake City, although, in the case I have illustrated, the portion of the road entering into actual competition is very slight in comparison with the length of the two roads?

Mr. CUMMINS. It will be remarked, and I hope the Senator from Utah will remember, that I have not objected to the use of the word "substantially." That seems to answer the question he has just propounded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Perhaps I misunderstood the Senator, but I understood——

Mr. CUMMINS. I object to the word "directly."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I now understand the Senator, but I say to him that I originally understood that he was in favor of the language contained in the first draft of the bill, which did not contain the word "substantially."

Mr. CUMMINS. I am in no wise responsible for the language used in the first draft of the bill. If I were trying to express the idea I would not use the language contained in the first draft of the bill, but it is very much better and more comprehensive than the language used in the last draft of the bill.

I think the case stated by the Senator from Utah would or would not fall within the prohibition of the first draft of the bill, dependent on whether the proposed line east of Denver had also a line to Colorado Springs. If it were intended simply to connect up the line from Chicago to Salt Lake City, the mere fact that there had been theretofore competition between Denver and Colorado Springs would be of no materiality whatever, because that is not competition in interstate traffic.

Mr. ELKINS. Before the Senator takes his seat, I should like to ask him a question. If we should strike out the word "directly," in this language, and say "substantially competitive," would that satisfy the Senator? I am now looking at the decision in the Northern Securities case. I have a copy of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. What satisfies me best is the amendment I shall offer to this section.

Mr. ELKINS. I understand the Senator has not yet offered the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have it before me, and I intend to offer it.

Mr. ELKINS. I supposed from what the Senator said that he would be satisfied with striking out the word "directly" and leaving it "substantially competitive."

Mr. CUMMINS. I would not, in connection with the other phraseology used here. I want to see the Senate employ such words as will prevent the consolidation of competing lines of railways.

Mr. ELKINS. I think everybody does.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. ELKINS. The committee does—the majority of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. If everybody does, we will have no difficulty in so amending this section as that the object will be accomplished.

Mr. ELKINS. I think the Senator will find himself in substantial agreement with his committee before he gets through.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is to say, you mean the committee is gradually being driven into harmony with me.

Mr. ELKINS. I put it the other way; just the reverse.

Mr. CUMMINS. It depends entirely upon the point of view.

Mr. ELKINS. Altogether.

Mr. CUMMINS. I prefer to occupy the one I have suggested.

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator read the amendment, if the Chair will allow me to address him? I should like, while we are on that point, to hear the amendment, because I remember vividly and distinctly the discussion in the committee as to the reasons why we changed this. And may I say further that I do not think, under the language used, the word "competing," you could buy a continuous road, a road that would make a continuous line or one at right angles or one coming in at another angle. Do we want that to go on in the United States—that you can not acquire these interests, not against——

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, in the case put by the Senator from West Virginia, there is no competition at all, and there is no objection to the acquisition by one carrier of any feeding line or branch line, or to any extension of its original line.

Mr. ELKINS. But, Mr. President, let me ask the Senator——

Mr. CUMMINS. That is not prohibited anywhere by any law, and is not proposed to be prohibited.

Mr. ELKINS. If you call in one of these railroad experts, he will say it does compete.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. ELKINS. And prove it to you, too.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not accept the opinion of railroad experts as implicitly as some people do.

Mr. ELKINS. They are pretty wise men touching the management of railroads.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to them when it comes to the management of their properties, but when it comes to the explanation of a law I have an opinion of my own. If the Senator from West Virginia will listen to me I will show him what I should like to have in the bill in this respect.

Mr. ELKINS. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is as follows:

That no common carrier as herein defined shall, after the passage of this act, purchase, lease, or in any manner acquire the control of or any interest in any competing railway or boat line, nor shall any such carrier purchase or hold under any subsequent purchase, directly or indirectly, any part of the capital stock, capital shares, or bonds of any other common carrier: Provided, however, That upon proper application and upon public hearing, the commission may, if it deems it necessary for the public welfare, permit the consolidation by lawful procedure of lines of transportation which are not competing lines of transportation, or it may permit the acquisition by one carrier of the stock or bonds of another carrier, if the line of the latter is not a competing line, and if the purpose and effect of the acquisition of such stock or bonds are to extend in the same general direction the line of the purchasing or acquiring carrier. In any such case the order of the commission shall state specifically the thing or things authorized and the manner in which the transaction is to be carried forward and completed.

Will the Senator from West Virginia accept that?

Mr. ELKINS. No; I will not, Mr. President, because I think it would do away with all these little lines scattered through the country and prevent the acquisition of those lines. I do not see the word "substantially" in there, though. He does not use that word.

Mr. CUMMINS. The word "substantially?"

Mr. ELKINS. It is left out of that amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to the word "substantially" in qualifying competition. A thing that is not substantial the law does not consider at all.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will.

Mr. NELSON. Why have section 12 at all in the act? The section aims in one form or another to tolerate what I call, in brief, railroad merger by the purchase of stock. Why not leave all that matter to the provisions of the antitrust law and eliminate section 12 altogether, without any hairsplitting on what this term or that term means. Is not that the rational course? Wipe out the whole section.

Mr. CUMMINS. I entirely agree with the Senator from Minnesota. I should like to eliminate the whole section. While it might be made good in those parts I have already read, there are parts which are so intolerable that when they come to be understood there will be but one conclusion, and that is that the entire section should be expunged.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, why not leave that general subject to the antitrust law and say nothing about it in this bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly willing that that shall be done, because I think the antitrust law, as it is gradually being expounded by the Supreme Court, will cover and prevent every combination or consolidation in restraint of trade that is to the injury of the American people.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand the Senator from Iowa is announcing a series of ultimatums——

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg pardon.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not only with reference——

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not hear the Senator. Will the Senator repeat what he has just stated? I did not hear it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand that the Senator from Iowa is announcing a series of ultimatums with relation to this bill, not only with regard to its principles, but with regard to its language, with the statement——

Mr. CUMMINS. What does the Senator mean by "ultimatum."

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator understands the meaning of that word.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Rhode Island is the man who pronounces ultimatums in this Chamber. The Senator from Iowa——

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Senator from Iowa was announcing a series of ultimatums——

Mr. CUMMINS. I have made no effort to invade the province of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not only in regard to the principles of the bill, but in regard to its language, and has said that if the committee or the Senate should hereafter decide to make any amendments to this measure it would be because the Senator from Iowa had driven us to do it. I understand that to be his attitude.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Rhode Island is usually accurate, although he is never generous, but in this instance he is not accurate. I have not been guilty of saying anything of the sort. The Senator from West Virginia suggested that I was gradually coming to the position of the committee. I retorted that the committee was gradually being compelled to come to my position.

Mr. ALDRICH. "Driven." You used the word "driven." That was the word of the Senator. He said he was "driving" us.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Rhode Island object to that language? Is it not parliamentary?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not object at all to the language. I was only trying to explain to the Senate what the purpose of the Senator from Iowa was as shown by his language.

Mr. CUMMINS. The purpose of the Senator from Iowa is to induce the Senate to change this bill. I think the Senator from Rhode Island must have understood that purpose unless he is slower of comprehension than he usually is.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SHIVELY. Is the Senator from Iowa satisfied that the Senator from Rhode Island has cleared up all doubts about the question we are discussing?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. What I object to, if my objection may be considered, is that the Senator from Iowa is assuming that if the Senate or the committee or anybody else should change the language of this bill afterwards in accordance with their judgment, they were driven to do so by the position taken by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Rhode Island, if he can gain any advantage by the suggestion he has just made, is entirely welcome to it. The Senate knows my attitude toward this bill. It knows I am endeavoring as best I can to expose some of its defects, and I intend to continue to do it without being in the least dismayed by the distortion which the Senator from Rhode Island has attempted to put upon my language.

I now come——

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator a question in connection with the suggestion made by the Senator from Minnesota. The present law, as it has been very carefully expounded by the Supreme Court, prevents certain mergers in restraint of trade by railroads through the method of combination. As I understand the Senator, he is entirely willing, in accord with the purpose of the law in that regard, and desirous that it should be maintained as it has been expounded by the Supreme Court; and the amendment offered by the Senator does not in any manner conflict with that, but goes further, and, it seems to me, without the necessity for it, provides for certain cases in which there may be those mergers and combinations by the approval of the commission, mergers which will not conflict with the purpose of the present law.

The question I want to ask the Senator is this: It seems to me the only possible practical effect of that amendment would be to permit mergers—I say, to permit it; that might not be the purpose, but the effect—where in the absence of that law they could not effect such a merger. I can conceive of only one case in which mergers would be possible under the present law, and that is where they do not conflict with the present antitrust law, unless it be that the railroads themselves, being organized in the main by state authority and with state charters, have not the power under their state charters to make such mergers.

The question I desire to ask the Senator is this: In a case where there is no conflict with the provisions of the antitrust law, but where the roads would come within the classes specified in the Senator's amendment, would the Senator hold that the passage of this law would permit the merger of roads which did not have the corporate power under their charters to do so?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think not.

Mr. BACON. I quite agree with the Senator that it could not. I am very glad to know that that is his view, and I think with that possibly eliminated the retention of the present law will effect all of the ends that would be accomplished by the amendment proposed by the Senator. I may be wrong; I have only heard it read; but it occurs to me that way.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the present law should be strengthened for the good of the country. I think there are some purchases and some acquisitions of railroads that have gone on the last few years which might well have been prohibited, that were not prohibited by the antitrust law. You will remember I said, in response to the statement of the Senator from Minnesota, I would vastly prefer to have the antitrust law untouched by this proposed section than to have the law as it would be if this section were adopted.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator, if he will allow me, to the fact that the Northern Securities case was one which involved the application of the Sherman antitrust law to railway mergers, and the decision laid down principles which cover, to my mind, every form of merger, whether in the form that took place in that case or by the purchase of stock. A suit is now pending, and it has been pending for two years, against the Union Pacific involving the same law. The merger in that case is not like that in the Northern Securities case. It is a merger which was accomplished by the purchase by one road of the stock of another road.

Mr. CUMMINS. What the Senator from Minnesota says——

Mr. NELSON. And, if the Senator will allow me further, there is a saving clause in section 12 in favor of that suit. Yet, to my mind, if we pass section 12, it will be utter folly to carry on that suit, because, if the Government should succeed in that suit, the company could go on, after the suit was over, under this law and do what it is charged with doing in the suit now. So, to my mind, if we adopt section 12 as it is in this bill, it will be all folly to carry on that prosecution which has been pending for two years against the Union Pacific merger.

Mr. CUMMINS. I concur entirely in the statement of the Senator from Minnesota. The amendment which I shall propose and which I read in the hearing of the Senate a few moments ago, it will be remembered, however, goes further and forbids the acquisition by one railroad company of the stock of another railroad company, whether they are competing or not, and of course that is not covered by the antitrust law.

I had in mind the use by Mr. Harriman of the $100,000,000 raised by a mortgage upon the Union Pacific Railroad. I need not refer to that transaction, which has already received universal condemnation. But I do not believe that any railroad company should be permitted to own the stock of any other common carrier, whether the two companies are, in the ordinary sense of the term, competitive or not. It is always destructive of the proper relations between the railway companies and the people to permit one railway company to have an influencing interest in the stock of another, without regard to their being competitive or otherwise.

But I now come——

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator allow me to refer——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. ELKINS. Section 12, which the Senator is willing to strike out, as is the Senator from Minnesota, is an effort surely to prevent the acquistion or the purchase of stock or the leasing of substantially competitive roads.

Mr. CUMMINS. I said originally that that was the avowed purpose. I am not willing to say that it is an effort to do that.

Mr. ELKINS. The purpose can be gathered from the language. Now, as suggested by the Senator from Georgia, there might be cases decided outside of those reached by the decision in the Northern Securities merger case that this would meet. This section would surely prevent the acquisition or the purchase of stock in those roads, and had we not, for greater security, adopt it? The Senator from Minnesota is willing to leave it all under the Northern Securities case decision. I am not willing, in a sense. I do not believe it is wise to allow under all conditions, as the Senator says, railroads to own stock in other railroads. There are conditions when I think it is wise——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from West Virginia will permit me to interject that either he misunderstood what I said or I very greatly misunderstand what he now says—either one or the other.

Mr. ELKINS. Another point I wish to make is that I can not see how section 12 would in any way validate or affect, under the reading of the statute as drawn, the pending suit, and if he will allow me to read it, I will not trespass upon him further.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not contend that it would affect the pending suit.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator from Minnesota, if I understood him, said it would be of no avail. I call the attention of both Senators to this language:

> But nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect the rights or liabilities of either party to any suit or action pending at the passage of this act, nor to authorize or validate the acquisition by a railroad corporation, being a common carrier subject to said act to regulate commerce, as amended, of any interest in the capital stock or the purchase or lease of the railroad of any other railroad company in violation of any other act of Congress, including the act approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies."

I do not see how the case could be reached in any better form. The only difference between the Senator and myself was, I believe, upon the terms "directly" and "substantially." The Senator——

Mr. CUMMINS. There are very many other differences.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator is willing to give up that word.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are many other differences, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. ELKINS. I am looking over the Northern Securities case. Surely the purpose of the authors of this bill is to reach an evil and to correct it if we can. I am unwilling to leave it where it is now under the Northern Securities case. I think we ought to reach it. I regret that it has ever been permitted under state laws that parallel and competing lines could hold stock in another road. It is an evil. It ought not to have been permitted, but having been permitted under the sanction of the law, I do not think it wise to disturb it now. But in the beginning it never should have occurred. I do not believe one road competing with another should own stock in that road.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I simply rise to say that I think the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] misunderstood me. I said there was a saving clause that would save this suit pending against the Union Pacific; but I also said that after that suit was over and decided, if this bill was passed with section 12 in the form in which it is, the company could commence de novo and secure stock and carry on the merger under the provisions of this law.

Mr. CUMMINS. I repeat that I think the law might well be amended so that it would be stronger, more comprehensive and effectual than the antitrust law. But this section narrows, in my opinion, rather than broadens the remedies which we have against combinations and consolidations.

But I have not reached the most objectionable part of this section. I now touch it, and I venture to say that the history of legislation can show nothing that parallels it—I was about to say in enormity. I have marveled more at the concluding part of this section than at any other part of this wonderful bill.

Let us see what it is. After these prohibitions to which I have referred, the bill then provides that if any two railroads are proposed to be consolidated or merged they may make an agreement to that effect, and if they are doubtful with respect to the validity of the merger or consolidation and want absolute protection and immunity before the transaction is carried into actual fact, they may file a petition in the court of commerce stating their case as they desire to state it, and the United States is then compelled to appear in that suit.

Thereupon it proceeds to judgment, and if, upon the case stated, the commerce court is of the opinion that the law is not violated in carrying into effect the agreement which is thus presented, it issues a certificate of innocence or legality, and that certificate and judgment constitute an estoppel between the effect of the consolidation and the United States.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the Senator understand that a shipper or an interested party who might be concerned in the proposed agreement may in any way intervene in this proceeding to be heard, to enter a plea, or to prosecute an objection to it?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all; the parties to the consolidation and the United States only are to be heard.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Do you not consider that it would be a blessed privilege if you and I were about to enter upon some questionable scheme and did not know exactly whether it was in the pale of the law, if we could go to some court in advance, before we embarked upon the scheme, and get them to bless it before we started in?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can conceive of nothing that would be so complete a garb of protection for illegal contracts and illegal combinations as the one that is thus proposed.

Mr. BACON. I wish to suggest to the Senator that there was at least one other that is equally as effective, and that was the method pursued by the steel corporation when it desired to absorb the Tennessee Coal and Iron Company and went and got a very high sanction and authority to proceed with the business before it undertook its performance.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. In answer to the Senator from Georgia, let me say it is as if the Senator from West Virginia were bent on destroying somebody, having made up his mind that he was going to kill him, he would set out all the circumstances that he intended should surround the transaction, and then go to a court and ask the court whether if I do the thing in this way I will be guilty of murder in the first degree, or murder in the second degree, or manslaughter, or possibly whether I may be acting in self-defense.

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator pardon an interruption? I want to call his attention to the fact that the illustration is not a parallel, because under this bill the man who was to be murdered and wanted to be murdered would also be one of the parties to the suit.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree it lacks in that one particular absolute accuracy, but it is the most wonderful and extraordinary thing that was ever proposed in legislation. Imagine that two years or three years ago you had been asked to amend the antitrust law by providing that the Tennessee Coal and Iron Company and the United States Steel Corporation could go together to a court and propose there what was about to be done, and bring the United States into the suit, and then have the transaction determined upon their statement of the transaction, and if the court found it was an innocent transaction, then forever the United States was to be estopped from questioning it, no matter what its consequences might be. Does the Senator from West Virginia believe that we ought to enter into a scheme of legislation of that kind?

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ELKINS. In the first place, I want to answer the Senator from Georgia by saying that I do not know of any direct authority issued by anybody that permitted the sanction of the acquisition of the Tennessee Coal and Iron Company by the United States Steel Trust.

Mr. CUMMINS. That question was asked of me, and I must be permitted, I think, to determine whether I will answer it or not. I do not yield to the Senator from West Virginia for the purpose of answering the question of the Senator from Georgia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa declines to yield.

Mr. ELKINS. I thought I ought to say that much. With the Senator's permission, I will say that I do not know of any authority had for the purpose of allowing that consolidation. I do say this is novel legislation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is that the only adjective the Senator can apply to it?

Mr. ELKINS. I may reserve any others, but we are treading unknown paths and in unbeaten ways to make laws to meet economic questions that never disturbed the statesmen of the world before.

These economic questions present more serious difficulties than any other in the history of the Government, almost not excepting the war period. We have to find the solution. We are trying to find out where we are and what to do and how to do it. This section, I say, is a new departure; but we are passing, if the Senator will allow me, so many laws, with so many different interpretations by the various courts, and it takes so long to get to the Supreme Court. Here is a transaction involving $25,000,000 or $30,000,000. The parties are afraid to proceed, first, lest they may lose their money, or, second, that they will be against the law and finally land in jail. Ought they not in some way to have advice by somebody before they enter into the transaction? One lawyer will say, "All right, proceed with the business transaction;" another lawyer will say, "You are a candidate for the penitentiary if you do go on."

Mr. CUMMINS. If engaged in an enterprise of that character, they ought to have them.

Mr. ELKINS. The fact is that we have in this country 46 States making laws, and Congress is making laws all the time. I do not understand how we are to get all those laws interpreted. Who can understand them? The courts can not decide them as fast as we make them. In the Roman Empire they required publishing the laws by hanging them up in the market place. But one emperor put the laws so high that the people could not read them, and then he punished them for violating them. We do quite as badly by passing so many laws they can not be read or understood. How would the Senator do? Would he let his clients take the chances?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is what we have been doing.

Mr. ELKINS. But a lot of men would have been candidates for the penitentiary if they had begun them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope they will not only be candidates, but elected.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask a question either of the Senator from Iowa or the Senator from West Virginia; it is immaterial to me, if either one knows. I do not know that it is proper for me to ask this question, but I should like to ascertain if anyone knows the author of this particular provision, and who as a lawyer has sanctioned it. I should like to know what lawyer has put his sanction upon this as a legal proposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can not answer that question to the satisfaction of the Senator from Idaho. I only know that when this draft came from New York this provision was in it, and that it has continued in it from that day until the present time. I am glad the Senator from West Virginia is not the author of it.

Mr. ELKINS. I introduced the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe that he is as much shocked at the suggestion as I have been. I assume that the Attorney-General is the author of this provision, and that it is in the bill at the suggestion of the President of the United States.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator from Iowa say that the President of the United States is responsible for it?

Mr. NELSON. It is clear from this discussion that the bill is an orphan. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator allow me one more question? I know I am trespassing a good deal, and I beg his indulgence. The President of the United States in his message stated that he had authorized or asked the Attorney-General to prepare a bill. That is in his special message. I do not know whether it is in the last message or the one before, but I have sent for the message.

Now, in obedience to this request from the President of the United States, he puts the views of the President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I can put——

Mr. ELKINS. Let me get through. In that sense it has the indorsement of the highest legal authority in the land. Now, the question is not who made this bill, or where it was made, or how it was made, or its evolution. The bill is before the Senate in due form, regularly reported. Is it right or is it wrong? That is the question we have to meet here; and where it was made, and how it was made, and its paternity I do not think we have anything to do with.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to add a word to what has just been said by the Senator from West Virginia and in answer to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. This bill, with this provision in it, accompanied the message to which the Senator from West Virginia referred. It came here under the guidance and under the protection of that message, and it had this identical provision in it when it was handed by the Attorney-General to the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then it is not, as the Senator from Minnesota suggested, an orphan.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have before me the special message of the President of the United States on interstate commerce and antitrust laws and federal incorporation, transmitted to the Senate January 7, 1910, and on page 10 of that message, in connection with the President's discussion of this whole subject of interstate-commerce legislation, I find this paragraph:

> By my direction the Attorney-General has drafted a bill to carry out these recommendations, which will be furnished upon request to the appropriate committee whenever it may be desired.

Mr. ELKINS. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin. It is on page 10. That was the message I was looking for that he has just read.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is not any doubt as to the responsibility.

Mr. ELKINS. The President said:

> By my direction the Attorney-General has drafted a bill to carry out these recommendations, which will be furnished upon request to the appropriate committee whenever it may be desired.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say one thing. I am glad and delighted that there is no existing law that requires, or that my oath of office does not require, me to oppose a bill because the President of the United States favors it and the Attorney-General wrote it.

Mr. BACON. That would save a great deal of trouble to some people.

Mr. ELKINS. It would.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I presume that we are all in the same frame of mind as the Senator from West Virginia on that point.

Mr. President, I asked the question that I did a few moments ago because it would be interesting to know by what process of reasoning and by what logic a lawyer arrived at the conclusion that you could enact this kind of a provision into a law of the United States and make it so that it would pass criticism if it should ever be called into the courts. There is nothing in the hearing or in the discussion or in the message or anywhere else that I have been able to find which gives a reason for it from a lawyer's standpoint. It might be all right if we were transacting business on the theory of a town meeting and meeting together for the purpose of arriving at a conclusion as to what we should do after final judgment was taken of all upon a particular subject; but as a legal proposition, I shall continue to assert that the President of the United States is not the author of this provision as a lawyer until he says so over his own signature, and I shall continue to assert that no one can find authority under the Constitution for undertaking to put such a provision into this act.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Iowa has referred to the Sherman antitrust act several times, and he also stated, if I understood him, that he had no objection to the use of the word "substantial" in any connection. I ask him if the word "substantial" were inserted before the words "restraint of trade" in the Sherman antitrust act, he thinks it would make no difference in the construction of the act?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it might under some expressions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. In connection with that matter, I would suggest that the interpretation of the word "substantial" was what the Supreme Court went off on in its interpretation of section 4 of the other act, and it changed the whole law on the subject and nullified the original intention of its framers.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not recognize anything said by the Senator from Connecticut or by the senior Senator from Idaho to be in conflict with anything that I have said.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My point was, if the Senator had no objection to the word "substantial," if it would not do to so amend the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not suggest any amendment to the antitrust law. I said I had no objection to requiring a substantial competition to exist between two railroads before we prohibited their consolidation. That is the proposition that I made, and I adhere to that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not mean to criticise the Senator's position, but I understood him to say that he had no objection to the use of the word "substantial" in any connection, and that it meant the same thing whether it said substantially or not. I thought it made a great difference whether the word "substantial" was in the Sherman antitrust law or not.

Mr. CUMMINS. It has made a difference in some of the decisions.

Now, Mr. President, this proposition has so startled the Senators present, and there has been so free an expression of dissent from the idea of allowing or creating a court for the purpose of hearing such cases in advance that I have not been able to give the weightiest reason which comes to me against the proposition. Waiving the matter of constitutional power, waiving the novelty of the idea, let me suggest to Senators that these cases will be determined upon the statement made by the persons or corporations who propose to enter into the transaction. There is no possibility of inquiring further than the printed page submitted by these proposed conspirators to the court, and yet when a judgment has been entered upon that printed page, the United States is forever estopped, no matter what may be done under these contracts or under these arrangements, if by any construction they can be held to be authorized by the agreement or arrangement as proposed to the court.

No civilized nation will permit its affairs to be determined in such a lawsuit. In order that the judgment of a court shall be of any value, it must be the outcome of a real controversy in which the actual facts have been developed and weighed with the principles of law applied to them.

I pass from this provision. I pass to another which is still worse, because the section grows as we proceed with it in extraordinary provisions. I now want to read you one which is also novel.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me, before leaving that, to suggest that the word "substantial" is never used in connection with law, and only in connection with definitions in equity? Courts of equity may do substantial justice in those cases wherein the law, by reason of its universality, is deficient, and so on that line; but the word "substantial" has no existence, because it is a wavering word in law, and law is an accurate statement of rule of action.

Mr. CUMMINS. I come now to the subject we are discussing. Of course, the one just suggested is a matter that we considered some time ago, but from now on we have a court of commerce that is considering a contract laid before it from the standpoint of the provisions of this proposed law and the antitrust law. That part of it which I have read gives the court authority to say whether the proposed transaction is in violation of either this law or the antitrust law. There might be some safety in that, but now follow me as I read the last clause of this section:

> In making the determination herein provided for the court shall take into consideration the effect of such proposed acquisition upon the due observance and effective enforcement of all the laws of the United States, and the relative importance of any benefit to the public interest and of any effect upon competition resulting from such acquisition.

I should like to know what the Senator who becomes the sponsor for this bill thinks that clause means. I assume that these words mean something, because they have come into the bill since it was originally composed by the high authors to whom I have referred several times. They came into the bill after these long hearings. What do they mean? They mean, if they mean anything, that when this proposed transaction is submitted to the court, notwithstanding it is found to be in violation of this law, notwithstanding it is found to be in violation of the antitrust law, nevertheless the court can, if it believes that the public welfare would be subserved, declare it to be a lawful agreement and a lawful arrangement.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think the language he has just read to the Senate undertakes to confer upon this court a legislative power, a legislative function, and not a judicial power?

Mr. CUMMINS. I was about to add to my last remark that it is so plainly and obviously beyond the power of Congress to confer upon the courts the right to determine whether any particular thing is in harmony with public policy or agreeable to the public welfare, that I wonder how any lawyer ever came to give his assent to the proposition.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ELKINS. The language is this:

> In making the determination herein provided for, the court shall take into consideration the effect of such proposed acquisition upon the due observance and effective enforcement of all the laws of the United States.

Now, could there be any objection to that? Do not courts do it when determining——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, we need no instruction to the court when it is enforcing the law.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me ask the Senator another question. If we strike out the words "and the relative importance of any benefit to the public interest" and leave in "of any benefit upon competition resulting from such acquisition," would it not be constitutional?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am opposed to the entire paragraph. It is unconstitutional; it is impolitic; it is unwise; it is contrary to all the notions of the civilized world.

Mr. ELKINS. We can not satisfy the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, sir; not so long as you attempt to keep that sort of a provision in the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia what he understands to be the meaning of the words "and the relative importance of any benefit to the public interest?"

Mr. ELKINS. I have just asked the Senator from Iowa if these words were stricken out, would he agree to the rest of the paragraph? I will ask the question of the Senator from Idaho. I want to say to the Senator that he is amongst the most learned and accomplished lawyers of the Senate. When he speaks, such a lawyer as I am must go aside. I ask him what it means. He interprets the law every day; he studies the law; he is in the law; he lives under the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the question?

Mr. ELKINS. I am asking the Senator from Idaho what those words mean.

Mr. BORAH. I would be very glad to transfer that question to the Senator from Iowa, because I have never been able to satisfy my mind what the clause does mean. The fact is, Mr. President, as the Senator from Iowa says, if it means anything at all it means the power of a court to suspend the operation of this law. It means, notwithstanding the fact that there may be a combination in contravention to the terms of the law, yet if the public interests so appeals to the court, the court may suspend the operation of the law and permit the combination. It confers upon the court two powers which are seldom conferred upon a court since the revolution in England in 1688, and that is to suspend the operation of law and at the same time to legislate.

That is the reason why I asked a while ago in all earnestness who was the author of this provision. I can not, with my limited knowledge of law, notwithstanding the high compliment of the Senator from West Virginia—I boast of no excessive knowledge of law—with my limited understanding of the law, I can not perceive how anyone could seriously contend that there could be written into a solemn act of legislation a provision which lodges anywhere, under a representative form of government, the power to suspend the solemnly enacted constitutional act of Congress.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me ask the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. ELKINS. May I ask the Senator from Idaho one question?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. ELKINS. What difference does it make who drew this proposed law? The question is whether it is right as it is before us now.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. ELKINS. Let me ask further, Is not the proposed law constitutional as it is drawn? That is the question.

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not think it is.

Mr. ELKINS. If you strike out the words "and the relative importance of any benefit to the public interest?"

Mr. BORAH. I thought if I could find out who drew this proposed law I would go as an humble penitent to the feet of that party and seek to find out by what authority they are undertaking to do it.

Mr. ELKINS. I think the Senator can determine that himself, and determine in the public interest, from the language. As to who is the author, suppose a man were in England?

Mr. BORAH. I should think this——

Mr. ELKINS. He would not cross the Atlantic to see you?

Mr. BORAH. I should think not a man from England; but we are speaking now of law in accordance with our idea of government, where you do not suspend the operation of the law, where you do not confer legislative powers upon a court. I submit that I should like to know the history and the genesis of this provision.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, Mr. President, I will enlighten the Senator from West Virginia, or rather recall his attention to an incident that happened before the committee, which will enable the Senate to know just what these words were intended to accomplish. I asked the Attorney-General when he was before the committee what these words meant and in what way it was proposed to make them operative. The Attorney-General is a very frank man, and, I repeat, he is a very learned man in this subject. This was his answer. I do not attempt to use his words. He said, Suppose we take the instance of a certain Canadian railroad becoming the owner or interested in railroads in New England, so that they could take up the freight of New England, carry it over the Canadian road to the western coast, and thus deprive the people of the United States or the railroads of the United States, of freight that originates within our own borders.

Now, said he, under the terms of this law, and of the antitrust law, the American railroads of New England are forbidden to acquire those railroads which are owned or may be owned by the Canadian companies; but, said he, everybody will recognize the desirability of having our railroads owned by ourselves and our freight carried in our own territory; and this provision might enable the court, when such a contract was put before it for its determination, to declare that notwithstanding the purchase proposed was of a competitive line, notwithstanding the transaction was denounced not only by this section, but by the antitrust law, nevertheless the court could say that for the general welfare of the United States and the people of the United States the court could suspend the operation of those laws with regard to that transaction. That is the theory that I heard expounded in the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. That was one of the arguments which were advanced by the defendants in the Northern Securities case, that the public was not injured, but really benefited, by the combination, and I apprehend that while they did not satisfy the court it would have been a matter which they would have had a perfect right to submit under this provision of law to this court.

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly. But I renew my suggestion. These words do mean something. The men who framed this bill did not employ language merely to fill the space of the bill. These words are used to accomplish just what I have suggested. It may be that if the question was before Congress, I should be very willing to vote to enable an American railroad to buy a railroad owned by a Canadian company, for I have as much loyalty and patriotism in that respect as, I think, any man can have; but I am not willing to give to the courts of the country the power to suspend and destroy an act of legislation either in such an instance or in any other. We have gone far, I think, to disparage our own authority when we propose that a court shall have any such jurisdiction. I believe, Mr. President, that what I have said with regard to that section is all that need to be said upon it.

Before I pass to the last section, I send to the desk an amendment which I propose to offer to section 12, which I ask to be printed and laid on the table to be hereafter offered.

Mr. FLINT. I suggest to the Senator to read it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have already read it once, and it is too long for me to now read it again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I now pass to sections 13, 14, and 15; and I intend that my review of those sections shall be very brief, because they are so complicated and so intricate that all I can hope to do is to inspire an effort on the part of Senators to become thoroughly familiar with them. Those sections enter upon a plan for the regulation of capitalization of common carriers. We have never yet attempted to regulate by Congress the issuance of stock or bonds. I am inclined to think that Congress has the authority to determine what the capitalization of corporations organized——

[At this point Mr. CUMMINS yielded to Mr. PURCELL, and the roll of the Senate was called.]

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, before I pass to the last sections of the bill I desire, in connection with my remarks upon the extraordinary proposition to give the courts jurisdiction to set aside the policy of Congress and override the letter of the laws, to read an extract from the testimony of one Otto H. Kahn, a very well-known banker of New York City. The testimony was given in the Union Pacific case now in progress:

Mr. Severance first asked the witness about the recent purchases of Southern Pacific stock at the morning session. At that time Mr. Kahn deferred answering until he had consulted with counsel, but when the afternoon session came Mr. Kahn volunteered a statement concerning it, explaining that while he had not gone back into the board of the Union Pacific at the time, his subsequent knowledge as a director covered the transaction. He said:

"A bill, we were informed, was introduced in Congress, or contemplated to be introduced in Congress, which would give to those railroads that had 50 per cent of the stock of another railroad, competing or otherwise, the right not only to retain that 50 per cent, but, if they so chose, to purchase the balance in addition to that 50 per cent, while railroads that had less than 50 per cent had no such assurance.

"Thereupon, on the advice of Judge Lovett, it was deemed in the best interests of the Union Pacific that its holding on Southern Pacific stock be increased to a total of 50 per cent of the entire outstanding amount of Southern Pacific stock—

You will observe in this some connection with the progress of this bill through the various conferences that have been held respecting it—

"A few weeks afterwards Judge Lovett advised that the terms of the bill, as he understood them, had been changed or were going to be changed—

This is Judge Lovett, who has taken the place made vacant by the death of Mr. Harriman, who controls the destinies of the Union Pacific road and all of its subsidiary companies. Judge Lovett had been to Washington—

"A few weeks afterwards Judge Lovett advised that the terms of the bill, as he understood them, had been changed or were going to be changed, and that the provision to which he referred and which was the reason of the purchase of additional Southern Pacific stock, would not go into the bill, and Judge Lovett advised that, in consequence, the purchase of additional Southern Pacific stock be stopped at once. It was stopped on the same day, and no more stock has since been acquired."

I submit that sworn statement of Mr. Kahn to the Senate as indicating something of the purposes of the railway companies with regard to this bill.

I now come to sections 13, 14, and 15, they being the last sections of the bill, and they deal with capitalization. It has not yet been decided that it was within the power of Congress to regulate or limit the capitalization of common carriers organized under the laws of the various States. I do not intend to enter into any inquiry or discussion with respect to that power. I am inclined to think that Congress has the power; but in order to reach that conclusion it will be necessary to first conclude that the capital stock, or the capital in a broader sense, of a common carrier doing an interstate business, is an instrumentality of commerce. I hope that the Supreme Court of the United States will so decide when the question shall come before it, if it ever reaches that tribunal; but there are some observations in the Northern Securities case, both on the part of the majority and the minority, that lead one to believe that it is far from a settled question in the minds of the justices of the Supreme Court. But I am willing, for the purposes of this argument, to concede to the author of this bill the power of Congress to limit the capitalization of railways engaged in interstate commerce. I do think, however, it would be wise, as we enter upon this somewhat untried field of the law, that our regulation concerning capitalization should be the subject of an independent measure and should not be so associated with other and undoubted powers of Congress as to imperil the law which may be passed in the exercise of the latter.

My objection to these sections are, first, that they are confined to railroads. I am in favor of a rigid supervision of the capitalization, not only of railroad companies, not only of common-carrier corporations, but of all corporations by the proper authorities. I do not believe that any capital stock should be issued by any corporation without the payment to the corporation or the agreement to pay to the corporation the full par value thereof. I do not believe that any bonds of the common-carrier corporations should be sold unless sold at the fair and reasonable market value of the bonds; but I object to the limitation of this wise provision to the railroads of the country. It is just as important that the capitalization of other common carriers be held within proper bounds as it is that the capitalization of railroad companies be limited. No reason has been given, and no reason can be given, for limiting the application of these sections to the railroad companies.

Allow me to state at this point—I omitted to do so a moment ago—just what these sections are in outline. They first provide that no capital stock shall be issued by the railroad companies hereafter without the payment at par for the stock to the corporation, and, if paid in services or in property, that the value of the services and the value of the property shall be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. So far so good. It is further provided that no bonds shall be issued and sold at less than par, unless under a certificate of the Interstate Commerce Commission fixing the reasonable selling price of the bonds, and then follows a long and intricate and complicated series of exceptions that practically destroy the efficiency of the original provision.

I have examined them carefully, and I am not able to conceive any scheme of capitalization which we have known in this country in the last twenty years that is not provided for in some one of the exceptions to the general rule laid down in the beginning of the section. It is another illustration of appearing to do a thing without doing it.

For instance, there is nothing in this section that would prevent a railroad company from being organized in any State in the Union, and during the course of the construction of the road covering it mountain high with stocks or bonds. Congress has no power, concededly, to control the capitalization of a railroad company while in the course of construction, if it is being constructed within the confines of a single State, but after its capitalization is issued and every harm that can possibly be done has been done, then the company can be united with an existing company, the capitalization assumed, and whatever evils result or follow overcapitalization go on unchecked and unimpeded. I think any lawyer in the Senate will undertake, notwithstanding the provisions of this bill, to issue all the capitalization, whether in stock or in bonds, that the most audacious promoter of the whole country may desire. The only way in which Congress, if it has the power at all, can ever deal with the capitalization of common carriers, is to forbid common carriers from doing an interstate business if the capital stock, after the passage of the law, has been issued in violation of the terms of the law. Then we will embrace all enterprises, whether they be carried on within the limits of a State or whether they cross the borders of a State, but this bill will be utterly ineffectual in the particular I have just mentioned.

Then I beg the attention of the Senate to almost the first phrase of the section:

> No railroad corporation which is a common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, shall hereafter issue for any purpose connected with or relating to any part of its business governed by said act—

It is attempted in that way in the issuance of capitalization to distinguish between the business of a corporation covered by this act and its other business. For instance, a railroad company engaged in mining coal can issue all the capitalization desired and refer it to its coal mines, and yet that capitalization will rest upon the entire property of the company, and its remuneration must depend upon the entire business of the company.

I asked the Attorney-General, while we were in discussion with him, whether the Pennsylvania Railroad could not build a garage costing $10,000 and put upon it $10,000,000 of stock or bonds which were to become a part of the regular capitalization of that company and still be lawful so far as this section is concerned. What value will we find in a provision of the law which permits an evasion of that character? It can take any segregated part of its property which happens to lie within the boundaries of a single State and which is not physically used in connection with its interstate business and use those parts as the instrumentality for issuing all the stocks and all the bonds, without the intervention of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that the promoters of the enterprise desire.

Again, there is no prohibition in this section against the capitalization of the increased value of railroad property. I may not have the sympathy of many Senators—although I hope I have—in the proposition that the time has come to forbid common carriers capitalizing what, for want of a better name, I shall describe as the "unearned increment"—the increasing value of their property occasioned by the general development of the country. I do not think that railway companies or common carriers have a right to exact of the people who use their properties charges that will give a reward or a remuneration upon these increased values. The property of a railroad company, or of any other common carrier, is in a sense devoted to the public service. There are rules applicable to these properties that are not applicable to ordinary private institutions and private enterprises. I do not think that a railway company like the Pennsylvania has any right to ask of the people who use it charges that will return interest upon the increased value of the property which that company now owns. But whether I am right or not in regard to these things, I am right in asserting that the railway companies and the common carriers ought not to be permitted to represent these increased values in stocks or in bonds, because to do so is to embarrass and to complicate the final solution and settlement of the very difficult problem that I have just suggested.

The stock now issued represents all this property, and if the railway companies have the right to regulate and fix their charges with respect to the increasing value of their property, then the stock outstanding will receive all these additional charges and these additional rewards. But it is not good policy, it is exceedingly unwise, to allow the railroads to capitalize this unearned increment, and thus when we do come to settle the question, which will happen some of these days, we will not be embarrassed by stock outstanding, representing such value, in the hands of innocent purchasers.

So, I say, with regard to the betterments and enlargements of railway property which are paid for out of surplus earnings—I mean the earnings beyond those necessary to maintain the property in full and complete condition and to reward those who have invested their moneys in the property—represent just so much taken by the railroad company in excess of fair and reasonable charges. When those surplus earnings are invested, as they have been in the case of nearly every railroad company in the United States, in additions to the property, in the enlargements of the property, in extensions of the property, the surplus earnings so invested, for the same reason, ought not to be capitalized, so that the people whom the railroad companies serve shall be compelled not only originally to pay excessive charges, but, after having paid them, and seeing them represented in capitalization, to be required to pay interest upon the exactions that ought not to have been made.

I give an illustration. I cite the case of a railway, one of the best railways in the western country; I think altogether the best railway in the western country. I do not remember the figures for the last two years, but up to two years ago, for a period of four years over which I had occasion to review the affairs of the company, it had earned 25 per cent per annum upon all its capital stock.

After paying all the interest upon its bonds, after paying 7 per cent upon all its preferred stock and 8 per cent upon all its common stock, it still had 17 or 18 per cent upon its stock capitalization undistributed. It used that surplus, year after year, in enlargements of its property and betterments; it used it for purposes which a railroad bookkeeper would charge to construction, to capitalization, and not to running expenses or the cost of maintenance and operation. From year to year it issued scrip on account of the surplus earnings, and when the scrip had aggregated enough in the hands of any stockholder it issued its capital stock for the scrip. And what was the result? The very people who had paid to this railroad company 17 per cent upon its capital stock—more than they ought to have paid if the charges had been regulated fairly and reasonably—were then asked to pay 17 per cent more upon the capital stock issued, which represented these unfair and unjust exactions.

Now, I am not attempting to settle that question. There are some very good people who believe that the increased value of railway property, occasioned merely by the growth and development of the country, belongs to the railway company and that the stock owners are entitled to be remunerated by reason of it. I am not going to discuss that. I do not so believe, but it is not imminent at the present time. All I ask is that if we are to enter upon a plan for the regulation of the capitalization of our common carriers we shall not sanction the capitalization of either the unearned increment or surplus earnings invested in the properties.

These sections to which I have referred will permit the capitalization of every increasing dollar that may be found in the railway property, toward which the railways have contributed not more than the energy and the business enterprise of all the rest of the people of the United States. It will permit the capitalization of these surplus earnings, which, as I have suggested, grow out of excessive rates. I simply want to hold that question free from embarrassing and complicating circumstances, such as the issuance of stock and its possession by thousands of innocent persons until we can grapple with the problem itself.

Finally, with regard to these sections, I protest against the provision which declares that even though a railroad company in issuing its stock and bonds were to violate every line and every letter of the section, and set afloat its capitalization in defiance of the law and in disregard of the very provision which we are about to enact, that nevertheless that capitalization shall be valid in the hands of innocent purchasers. That one provision nullifies the whole attempt. Of course the securities will always be in the hands of innocent purchasers. If we are in good faith attempting to limit stocks and bonds to the actual investment, then we must not permit the transfer of the stocks and the bonds to men who may have had no knowledge of the transaction itself to validate those stocks and bonds. The only reason, the only purpose of the proposed statute is to relieve the people of the country from the burden of paying interest upon these bonds and of paying dividends upon the stock.

If that is not our purpose, then we are wasting our time, and if we want to relieve them of this burden, we must say that stocks and bonds issued contrary to the command of Congress shall have no validity whatsoever, no matter in whose hands they may happen to be. Thus and thus only will we ever prevent what everybody now concedes is an ever-growing evil.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Right here, if the Senator will permit me, arises a point which I confess gives me some trouble. Is it the idea of the Senator that stocks and bonds already issued, although in the hands of innocent parties, should be treated as they would be treated were they in the hands of the parties who were responsible for the illegal transactions of issuing them without a bona fide consideration? I am speaking of what has already occurred, not as to what will occur in the future.

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as I am concerned, I believe there should be no effort made to invalidate stocks and bonds heretofore issued; I mean no effort so far as Congress is concerned. I believe in accepting the situation as it is. If we have been so neglectful of public interests as to allow a custom or habit to proceed which we now condemn, I do not believe we ought to try to visit the penalty of our negligence upon those who have taken stocks and bonds in reliance upon the law as it is. I am speaking only of stocks and bonds to be hereafter issued; to be issued after this law goes into effect, and after every citizen of the United States either knows, or will be presumed to know, its terms.

I send to the desk to be printed and laid upon the table, to be hereafter offered, a substitute for sections 13, 14, and 15.

The amendments are as follows:

Strike out sections 13, 14, and 15 and substitute therefor the following:

"SEC. 13. That no corporation or joint-stock association being a common carrier as defined in the act to which this is an amendment shall, after the passage of this act, engaged in interstate commerce unless its capital stock hereafter issued has been issued and the proceeds of its bonds as herein required. No share of capital stock or certificate thereof, nor any share of capital or evidence thereof shall be issued unless the par value of the same, or more, has first been paid in cash into the treasury of the corporation or joint-stock association therefor, or unless the par value of the same, or more, has been paid to the corporation or joint-stock association by the transfer or conveyance of property to the corporation or joint-stock association which the corporation or joint-stock association can lawfully purchase and hold; and if it is sought to pay for any capital stock or share of capital in property, then the value of the property to be so transferred and conveyed shall, prior to the issuance of the certificate or other evidence of shares, be determined by the commission, upon the application of the corporation or joint-stock association, in such form as the commission may prescribe, and no property shall be received in payment of capital stock or share at a greater value than so fixed by the commission. No such corporation or joint-stock association shall issue any capital stock or share or shares or any certificate or evidence thereof for or on account of the increased value of any property already owned by the corporation or joint-stock association, nor for or on account of earnings, whether in hand or theretofore expended in the maintenance, operation, betterment, or enlargement of its railway or other line of transportation. The money or property received by any such corporation or joint-stock association for its capital stock or shares issued as aforesaid, must be used either for the payment of indebtedness or the maintenance, operation, betterment, or enlargement of its transportation facilities and not otherwise. Capital stock or shares issued in violation of the provisions of this section shall be void, whether in the hands of the original purchaser or any subsequent purchaser, and may be canceled in a suit brought by the commission or by any citizen of the United States for that purpose. Every stockholder, director, or officer through whose vote or act a violation of the provisions of this section occurs shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $5,000 and not more than $10,000 and be imprisoned not less than one year and not more than three years.

"That no corporation or joint-stock association, being a common carrier as defined in the acts to which this act is an amendment, shall use or expend the proceeds or any part thereof, of bonds or other evidences of indebtedness issued by it and secured by mortgage, deed of trust, or other lien upon the property of such carrier, except as follows, to wit:

"First. In refunding existing bonds or other evidences of indebtedness secured by mortgage, or deed of trust, or other lien upon the property of the corporation or joint-stock association, in which event the par of the new bonds or other evidences of indebtedness shall not exceed the par of the existing bonds or other evidences of indebtedness.

"Second. To pay indebtedness incurred in the extension, betterment, maintenance, or operation of the facilities or instrumentalities for transportation.

"Third. For the construction or acquisition of additional lines, facilities, and instrumentalities for transportation which the corporation or joint-stock association may lawfully construct or acquire.

"Any officer, director, stockholder, representative, or agent, through whose act or vote a violation of the provisions of this section shall occur, shall be liable for the entire sum so misused or so misexpended, and such liability may be enforced either in a suit brought by the corporation or joint-stock association or by the United States in behalf of and for the use of such corporation or joint-stock association; and any such officer, director, stockholder, representative, or agent shall also be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000, and imprisoned not less than one year and not more than ten years."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have completed my review of this bill. I desire to present, and have laid upon the table, two further amendments, which are not, in a proper sense, amendments to the sections that I have discussed, but are pertinent to the general scope of the bill. I ask that they be printed and laid upon the table. They will be hereafter offered.

The amendments are as follows:

Add as a new section of the law the following:

"That no common carrier shall, after the 1st day of January, 1912, transport or carry freight or passengers from one State to or through another; from, to, through, or in the District of Columbia; from, to, through, or in a Territory of the United States, or to or from the United States and any foreign country, if it is engaged in or controls, directly or indirectly, whether through the ownership of stock in any other corporation or otherwise, any other business. The provisions of this section may be enforced by a suit brought for injunction in any court of competent jurisdiction by the United States or any citizen thereof."

Amend section 1 of the act of 1887, as amended, by adding thereto the following:

"The term 'common carrier' shall include telegraph and telephone companies, and also all corporations which hold such an interest, direct or indirect, in the stock, bonds, or other property of a common carrier, as gives control or management over such common carrier or its affairs."

Mr. CUMMINS. Senators, I owe you all an apology for consuming the time that I have taken in examining this bill. It has been a dreary and a somewhat difficult work. I have for years felt the profoundest interest in the subject we are considering. I believe there is no other subject that concerns the welfare of the American people more deeply than the regulation of our interstate carriers. All business, in the end, must depend upon the fair and reasonable treatment accorded by carriers to the men who must employ their services. We have reached a time when the absolute charge or rate imposed is not more important than the relative rates or charges imposed. The people of this country, from one end to the other, are in continuous competition with each other, town with town, city with city, man with man, corporation with corporation, and none of them will feel that justice has been done unless they have a fair chance in the struggle. We have been engaged now, as I said in the beginning, twenty-three years in the effort to do for the people of the United States that which every right-minded man at once agrees should be done in their behalf.

We have come now to examine the defects—the weaknesses of the law of 1906. I have attempted to point them out as best

I could, but I agree that the things which have seemed to me imperative in the amendment of the law have been almost forgotten in my fear that we are about to lose the fruits of victories already won. There is here so determined a purpose, apparently, to take away from the people some of the safeguards which they now have that I have given most of my time and most of my energy to the exposition of those parts of this bill which I believe, if enacted into law, will carry us backward instead of forward. If what I have said induces a serious study of this measure upon the part of every Senator, my time will not have been spent in vain.

I hope, I believe, you will give it the most mature consideration. I have not examined the bill with the slightest hostility to the railway companies. I understand, as well as any Senator can, that there can be no prosperity in our country unless it is shared by our common carriers. I have always stood as firmly for ample and adequate compensation to them as I have stood against what I believe to be their unfair practices and unjust discriminations. With the utmost good feeling toward every interest, I appeal for even-handed justice.

Mr. HALE obtained the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BAILEY. It is merely to submit a request.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, in the course of the very excellent and instructive address which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has delivered to the Senate there have been many interruptions. I myself have been one of the chief offenders. All Senators understand how desirable it is that an argument shall not be interrupted in its continuity; and I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Iowa shall have the right to eliminate any interruptions which may have occurred in the course of his speech that he desires to eliminate. Of course the Senator would not leave in or omit anything which would put any other Senator in a false attitude or represent him as expressing an inconsiderate opinion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HALE. I should be entirely willing to leave that matter to the good sense and good feeling of the Senator from Iowa, but I do not know how far such a request as has been made by the Senator from Texas would go. Debate in the Senate, not simply speechmaking, is what brings out, as the Senator knows very well, the attitude of the Senate and the views of different Senators. If a Senator who has made a significant and important and representative speech, as the Senator from Iowa has, should strike out of his speech all interruptions, all interrogations, and all statements made in the course of that speech by other Senators, the RECORD would not reproduce the exact proceedings, and I do not think the Senator himself would desire that. It may be that the Senator from Texas does not mean that should be involved in his suggestion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very thankful to the Senator from Texas for the suggestion, but I do not want to eliminate from my speech the interruptions pertinent to the subject under discussion. I suppose the Senator from Texas had in view one or two, or possibly three, somewhat extended speeches that were made after a proper yielding on my part, but which really had nothing to do with the subject-matter under consideration, although very instructive and entertaining in themselves. Otherwise I would be very sorry to omit from the RECORD the interruptions, because my speech has been made largely upon those interruptions and in answer to the questions that were propounded to me during the course of those interruptions.

Mr. HALE. Right on that point——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Maine permit me——

Mr. HALE. Yes; that is all a matter of colloquy, of course.

Mr. BAILEY. It has been so long since the Senator from Maine was not a Member of Congress that he does not know so well as some of us who have come here since he came the confusion that exists in trying to read a speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. You may be pursuing one line of thought, and here comes an interruption that sometimes will last for ten minutes, and when the reader is through reading the interruption he has lost the thread of the discourse. What I wanted to do, and what I think every Senator in this body is entitled to have done, is to allow him to present his argument in his own way. Of course, I assume that every Senator, upon his responsibility as a member of this body, would not eliminate anything that was pertinent, and therefore I guarded against that, permitting him broad latitude in excluding whatever interruption the Senator desired to exclude.

And I want to say this: The Senator's speech, as he has delivered it, would be an extended and an exhaustive one, but it will exhaust the reader before it does the subject if the reader must read all of the interruptions which have occurred. I think the Senator's speech is a contribution to the literature of this subject, though I do not agree with all he has said; and while, more than once, I interposed to accentuate the political differences on that side of the Chamber—a fair subject of comment, as I believe—still I do not insist that even they shall remain in the RECORD.

But if there is any objection to my request, Mr. President, recognizing the fact that these interruptions are a part of the proceedings, I will not press it, though I think it entirely reasonable.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is entirely reasonable about that, as he always is. I do not think we would better now in this case, and not at present in any other, depart from the practice of the Senate. The truth is that interruptions and questions and suggestions yielded for by the Senator who has the floor and who is making a speech frequently make a live part of the speech.

The Senator from Iowa is a natural debater. I do not think he objects to interruptions, and it really is in the control of the Senator who has the floor. I have been impatient; so has the Senator from Texas and other Senators, when a Senator is making a clear-cut, deliberate, and well-considered speech, to see him interrupted by some Senator to ask a question, and that Senator then goes on to make a speech, and the second Senator is interrupted by another Senator, who asks him a question, and the third Senator goes on and makes a speech. It does, as Shakespeare says, turn awry the current of the thought and action.

But that is the practice of the Senate. It is the only way, and the interruptions appear finally, when the Senator revises his speech, as a part of his speech; and until we adopt some rule which changes that practice, with all deference to the Senator from Iowa, I do not think that we would better change it now. I think the Senator is right in not insisting on his request——

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Maine does not understand that I am insisting on this?

Mr. HALE. Not in the least.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Maine has stated his position, and I will not put him to the necessity of making an objection. I withdraw the request.

Mr. HALE. And leave the matter as it is.

Now, let me say right here, that is a matter for Senators individually. Sometimes a Senator says "I have what I believe to be a clear line of thought, which I shall present in argument, and I ask that I shall not be interrupted until the close of my remarks. I will be glad then to answer any questions." The Senate always responds to that. On the other hand, there are Senators familiar in debate, adroit, able, ready to answer questions, who do not seek to avoid questions and interruptions. I may say, myself, that I have always felt, in taking the time of the Senate, that whatever I said was likely to be enlightened by interruptions and answers such as I am able to give. But every Senator has it in his power when he starts in to make his address and present his subject to the Senate to ask that he be not interrupted until he closes, and the Senate always regards such a request.

But when that is not done, Mr. President, I think it is better to leave it as it is now. While the Senator's speech, able as it is, sticking to his subject, covering the whole ground, will be lengthened, and perhaps unduly lengthened, I do not think it would be harmed in its effect upon any human mind that was thrown in contact with it, and reads it, by any interruptions that were made. So I think, Mr. President, we had better leave it as it is.

I rose for the purpose of saying that, as the Senator has completed his most interesting speech, and as I have inquired and find that there is no Senator desirous of going on to-morrow, I propose to move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Let me say I am very desirous, and I think Senators generally are, of pushing forward the public business. This bill has the right of way. There will be next week one or two big appropriation bills, which always have the right of way.

I want to say to the Senator from Texas that one reason I have in expediting, or trying to expedite, not unduly, this matter and getting it out of the way is that the Senate has to confront other measures. There are other important bills the Senate has to face, and it can not face them while this bill is in the way.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has an important matter which he wants to bring before the Senate. The statehood bill is a measure the Senate has to confront, has to meet, and it can not come up until this bill is out of the way, nor can we adjourn until that is out of the way. Bearing in mind the appropriation bills and other bills the Senate has to face, I am not too early in trying to expedite the public business and trying to push this matter forward and keep it before the Senate and consume upon it as many hours each day as we can.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has not trespassed upon the time of the Senate. He has gone on and talked every day up to the point of ordinary senatorial and human endurance, and has not in any way contributed to delay. I hope next week we can bring this matter to a head and reach a vote on it and be ready to consider the appropriation bills, so that the statehood bill and other measures will force themselves before the Senate and be acted upon before we get through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not wish to address myself to that motion.

Mr. HALE. Then, let the motion be put.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, before the question is put I should like to ask the Senator from Maine or the Senator from Texas whether any progress has been made with reference to the proposition of the Senator from Texas that we should meet at 2 o'clock instead of 12.

In this connection I wish to say that I have caused an examination to be made of the sessions of the Senate during the various legislative days, and I find that on an average the Senate has been in session less than three hours a day upon every legislative day during the present session. As I understand it, there has never been in the history of the Senate such a marked lack of interest in the debates and such a partial attendance as there has been during this session. I understand that to be largely due to the fact that our committees have been overloaded with work, that they have not had enough hours outside of the legislative hours in which to transact their business—I refer to the important committees—that they have been obliged to hold their sessions while the Senate is itself in session, and thus we are deprived of the services on the floor of some of the most able and experienced Senators in this body.

The pressure upon the Senate has thus far been the pressure of committee work, and that is likely to continue for two weeks longer, I imagine. It seems to me that we would expedite that committee work and expedite the work of the Senate if we would adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Texas and hold our sessions from 2 until 5 or half past 5 o'clock. In conversation I have attempted to test in a measure the sentiment of the Senate upon that matter, and I believe that, if brought to a vote, it would carry. It might be more difficult to carry it now than it would have been a month ago; but I find quite a universal sentiment in favor of enlarging the opportunity of committees for their work, and, in so doing, postponing the daily meeting of the Senate to a later hour.

Mr. HALE. In other words, the Senator is irked by the inattention of the Senate during its present session. If there were no session, there would be no inattention. That is the logic of the Senator. You can not help this matter by shortening the session. However, that is not a subject-matter of debate now, and I suppose my motion is not debatable.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I want to say in reply to the inquiry made by the Senator from Nevada that I am more to blame now than the Committee on Rules. A subcommittee has been appointed to consider and report to the full committee. I am a member of that subcommittee, and it has not done its work simply because it has had so much other work to do, just as the Senator from Nevada has suggested. The report ought to have been made before this, and I think it will be adopted when it is presented for our consideration; but a glance at the rules will disclose that there are a number of changes that must be made in order to conform to this principal change. For instance, the rules provide that certain things shall be done at 1 o'clock; at 2 o'clock other business shall be laid before the body. Obviously it is necessary, if we change the hour of meeting from 12 to 2, that those regulations shall be amended in some particulars.

I want to say further that not only is it true of this session, but it is true of every session of Congress, that more than one-half of the time the Senate will meet at 12 o'clock and adjourn before half past 3 o'clock, the session of the Senate intervening just when we could have been doing our most useful work.

Mr. President, I suppose that every Senator here will bear me witness that four-fifths of our work is done in the committee rooms and at our desks. If we are to remain in session four or five hours a day it simply means for those of us who must work a task beyond human endurance. There is not a more useful Senator in this body than the Senator from Maine, and yet his committee work is such that he only comes in now and then to give us the benefit of his advice about how speedily we ought to dispose of some pending bill.

Mr. HALE. It is good advice.

Mr. BAILEY. I know it is. I do not say that in any ironical way. I know the value of the Senator's service, and I know the constancy of his service. I venture to say that he has now come from the room of the Committee on Appropriations or probably from the Committee on Naval Affairs, where he has been at his work.

Now, it happens that all of us can not be constantly engaged in this committee work, much as we would like to be, for we must come here at 12 o'clock with an absolute knowledge of the fact that between 12 and half past 2 every member of the body at one time or another will absent himself from the sessions of the Senate for from half an hour to one hour and a half.

In my opinion, if we would assemble here at 2 o'clock, having attended to our committee work and disposed of our correspondence, and having refreshed ourselves with a modest lunch, we would be ready to address ourselves to the work before us; and we would seldom witness, as we do now, more than half the seats in the Senate unoccupied. I think when we come to debate the matter and to examine the record it will be demonstrated that for more than one-half of every session, if we were to meet at 2 o'clock, we would dispose of all that we dispose of now and adjourn before 5. That is a consummation, I think, which every man will agree is devoutly to be wished.

I want to say in further response to the Senator from Maine that I have no disposition to delay this bill. I will try to be as frank with him about this matter as I always endeavor to be about all matters. I do not intend, if I can help it, to let the Senate dispose of other matters necessary to be disposed of from time to time and then dispose of this bill and adjourn with the statehood bill on the calendar. I believe that the people of those two Territories are entitled to the inestimable privileges of self-government; and, so far as it lies in my power, I intend to force, if possible, a disposition of that question at the present session.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator has not forgotten that I stated as a reason why I wanted to get the railroad bill out of the way that the Senate has to confront the statehood bill.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senate could very easily run away from it after confronting it. When the summer time comes we are so eager, many of us, to return to our homes that we can not be kept here after that. I have seen that bill pending since I became a member of this body, and a majority of the Senate has been ready to vote any time the roll call was ordered to admit those two Territories, but there have been political maneuvers and there have been advantages sought which have delayed it until now.

I will make this agreement with the Senator from Maine, so far as I am concerned. If he will agree to lay this bill temporarily aside and take up the statehood bill and pass it, I will come here as early as he will and stay as late until the vote is taken on this bill. I have no disposition to prevent a vote.

Mr. HALE. The Senator knows—he is a practical Senator—I am not a member of either committee, and I do not know——

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator is a member of the governing body of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I can not control the management of the bill that is now the unfinished business, neither can I make any agreement about the statehood bill. I am not a member of that committee. I do not know that the Senator is a member of it.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not a member either.

Mr. HALE. He and I therefore can use up the time of the Senate in talking about it, but we can not make any agreement. I have indicated, and it is all that I can do, that I believe we have to take up that subject, but I do not want to discuss it here and now.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine has been trying to arrange this other matter, and my recollection is that he is not a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. HALE. No; but I am trying to arrange the public business.

Mr. BAILEY. This other measure is public business too.

Mr. HALE. No; not yet.
Mr. BAILEY. Yes; it is on the calendar.
Mr. HALE. But this is the unfinished business.
Mr. BAILEY. Oh, yes. But how was it made the unfinished business? By a unanimous agreement. I do not ask to displace it. It will be temporarily laid aside, when the Senator and I finish this colloquy, and the Senate will probably proceed to some other business. All I say is that if it is temporarily laid aside and we pass the statehood bill, I will agree not to interpose one hour's delay in this matter.
Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me?
Mr. HALE. I would be glad to have a vote on my motion, which is not a debatable motion, but I will not insist upon it.
Mr. CLAPP. I want to say that I rather think there is force in the suggestion of the Senator from Texas. I believe that we have made great headway with the railroad bill. I believe that the exhaustive address of the junior Senator from Iowa has convinced the Senate and will convince the Attorney-General that there are modifications which should be made in the bill. I believe that if for a few days, a brief time, the bill could be temporarily laid aside, as the result of the speech of the Senator from Iowa, modifications of the bill could be agreed upon which would very much expedite its passage and eliminate to a great extent otherwise the debate upon the bill.
Mr. HALE. I suppose the Senator knows that that can not be done now.
Mr. CLAPP. It could be done by unanimous consent.
Mr. HALE. Of course the committee will not agree to that. I am not a member of that committee.
Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator is an influential and a leading member on the other side, and I think if he would prefer a request for unanimous consent it would not be negatived.
Mr. HALE. I leave that, Mr. President, to the chairman of the committee.
Mr. BAILEY. The chairman of the committee would lay this bill or any other bill aside to give statehood to New Mexico. When a Delegate in the other House—I will not say, as I stated the other day, forty years ago, because he is hardly that old [laughter]—but when a Delegate from the Territory of New Mexico in the other House he, through his influence and his persuasion, procured the passage of a bill admitting New Mexico as a State into the Union. I know it still lies very near his heart. He owes those people much. He owes his start in life to them. They gave him his first important office. He filled it well. He is to-day more popular than a Republican ought to be in that Territory, and he would lay this bill aside to extend statehood to New Mexico. The Senator from West Virginia smiles his acquiescence in my statement.
Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.
The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.
The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 21, 1910, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 18, 1910.

(Continuation of legislative day of Thursday, March 17, 1910.)

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, the House has been in session now continuously for thirteen and a half hours. The Official Reporters of debates have been in continuous attendance. The proceedings of the House have consisted entirely of debate, requiring the constant attention and labor of these men, without even affording to them the opportunity of obtaining the ordinary refreshments that Members of the House require. In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, the questions that are involved in the point of order which has been raised on the resolution offered by the gentleman from Nebraska are of the utmost importance, and no judge, if called upon to decide the matter, would be expected to render a decision and to give his reasons for that decision from the bench without careful consideration.
I submit, in view of the length of the session, in view of the fact that the rights of no Member, the rights of no party in this House will be affected one way or the other by a recess until 11.55 o'clock to-morrow morning—this morning—we ought, in justice to ourselves, in justice to the importance of the questions that are pending before us and before the Speaker, and in justice to the faithful employees of this House, to take a recess until that time.
I therefore move, Mr. Speaker, that the House stand in recess until 11.55 o'clock this morning.
The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that the House stand in recess until 11.55 o'clock this morning.
The question was taken.
The SPEAKER. The ayes seem to have it.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered.
The question was again taken; and there were—yeas 134, nays 141, answered "present" 15, not voting 99, as follows:

So the motion to take a recess was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. SPERRY with Mr. AMES.

For balance of the night:

Mr. HUBBARD of West Virginia with Mr. RICHARDSON.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington with Mr. SPARKMAN.

Mr. HENRY W. PALMER with Mr. LAMB.

For balance of the day:

Mr. ANDRUS with Mr. SIMS.

From 1.30 a. m. to 9 a. m.:

Mr. STERLING with Mr. SHACKLEFORD.

For the session:

Mr. WANGER with Mr. ADAMSON.

Mr. AMES. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with Mr. SPERRY, and I wish to vote "present" instead of "no."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called Mr. AMES's name, and he voted "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the enforcement of the rule against smoking in the Hall of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that the rule is enforced.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose to-night to correct some erroneous impressions which evidently exist in the minds of a number of Members of the House as to the Committee on Rules. A year ago there was considerable of agitation in the country to make the Committee on Rules an elective committee. The Committee on Rules differs from the legislative committees in that it has jurisdiction of the order of business. We have about 800 committee assignments in the House. It is easy to see that it would at least be difficult without the intervention of a committee for a body of 391 Members to designate, from among their own number, persons to fill 800 places.

Those who have attended a modest county convention of 100 delegates and have found its time absorbed an entire day in the nomination of half a dozen candidates can realize the difficulty that will be experienced in a convention of 391 Members designating from among themselves persons to fill 800 places without the intervention of a committee. But the Committee on Rules, having a somewhat different character from other committees of the House, it seemed to me that it might be practical to choose this committee directly by the membership. When I had reached that conclusion the question arose whether the Republicans should elect the Republican members and the Democrats the Democratic members, or whether the whole committee should be selected by the body of the House. It occurred to me that where there was dissension in the majority party—and of course that was purely by reason of fear that such a thing might occur in the future—it occurred to me if there should be a dissension in the majority party that a small minority of the majority party could unite with the minority party to fill all the places.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I rose to a question of order, and that is that the gentleman from Iowa is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, the gentleman, I think, is in error on that subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair heard the gentleman from Missouri, and he did not come within a gunshot of discussing the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But if anybody had raised the point of order, the Chair ought to have sustained it. Two wrongs do not make a right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa will proceed in order. The Chair, however, desires to state that from the beginning of this discussion this afternoon up to the present time most of the talk has not been upon the point of order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that on the roll call that was just finished, before the point of order of no quorum was made, that a quorum was shown by that roll call and that fixes the status of the House, no intervening business having taken place in that time.

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point of order that intervening business has occurred. The gentleman from Iowa has taken the floor and has addressed the House for at least ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not fifteen minutes; perhaps five minutes. I make the point of order that the point of no quorum is dilatory.

Mr. TAWNEY. It was made by a Member on that side of the House, and I do not think the gentleman from Alabama would accuse one of his colleagues of making a dilatory motion at 2 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can assure my friend from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] that it was no personal reflection on my part, but I make the point of order, and I think the Speaker has repeatedly held, that where a roll call had immediately preceded, showing that there was a quorum——

Mr. TAWNEY. This is not immediately. The House has proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. You might as well go on. We will order a call of the House. You might as well go on with the debate, if you want to do so. But I insist on the point of order.

Mr. MANN. It is the right of a Member when he addresses the House to have a quorum of the House present.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to correct the result of the last vote? I understand there was an error made by the Clerk, and the majority instead of being 1 against taking a recess was in reality 7. I think that ought to be shown.

The SPEAKER. The Journal clerk informs the Chair, if the gentleman will withdraw his point for the time being of no quorum——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I withdraw it for the present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is getting information from the Clerk as to the status of the vote, on the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. The paper that the Chair picked up had 134 to 135.

Mr. JAMES. I do not question the result.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair is informed by the Clerk that the "7" was taken for a "1," in error. It does not change the result.

Mr. JAMES. I understand.

The SPEAKER. But the Journal ought to show the fact. The tally sheet was all right. It came out all right in the Journal. So no action is needed except to call attention to it.

Mr. JAMES. I merely wanted the record to be correct; that is all.

The SPEAKER. The record of the vote ought to be correct, and is correct. The tally sheet was correct, and it was an error in addition, which is not strange.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. What became of the point of no quorum?

The SPEAKER. It was withdrawn.

Mr. MANN. Temporarily?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I withdraw it permanently.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will renew it, Mr. Speaker. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And I make the point of order that the last roll call, which immediately preceded this, showed that a quorum was present. Therefore under the former rulings of the Chair a quorum is present now.

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] had taken the floor and had addressed the House for at least ten minutes before the point of no quorum was made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], and the RECORD has also been corrected since that time. The House has transacted business since the last roll call, and it is manifest that a quorum is not present. A Member is addressing the House and is entitled to at least the presence of a quorum when he is addressing the House.

The SPEAKER. The point of no quorum under the practice of the House could take a Member off his feet. The only question the Chair is trying to determine is the point raised by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] as to whether the Chair may fairly presume a quorum from the last roll call, which was some minutes ago.

Yet the Chair, considering that this is ten minutes after a call, and the House has been in session for fourteen hours, as the Chair is informed, a good many gentlemen have paired, and the Chair must trust under these conditions to the senses of the Chair as well, which indicate that a quorum is not present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves a call of the House.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 16.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it, and the call of the House is ordered. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire whether the roll call shows a quorum present?

The SPEAKER. We are just ascertaining; it has not been reported to the Speaker. [After a pause.] One hundred and fifty-four have answered to their names; not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to arrest absentees and bring them to the bar of the House.

The SPEAKER. The order usually adopted is:

Ordered, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its Members as are absent without leave

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to make a motion to that effect, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves as read by the Chair.

The question was taken, and the order was agreed to.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JAMES. In view of the situation that confronts the House, could not the minority, who are here present and sending for the majority in order to make a quorum, detail or deputize certain employees of the minority to go after the members of the majority in order that we might have a quorum to do business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will refer the gentleman from Kentucky to the Sergeant-at-Arms for an answer to that question.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, to whom does the gentleman from Kentucky refer, or to which side of the House does he refer in his statement in regard to the presence of the minority? I observe that there are as many men absent on that side of the House as on this.

Mr. JAMES. Then the gentleman's powers of observation are very bad. The fact is, as we are informed, that Members upon the majority side have been engaged in sending Members away from the House in order to break a quorum and prevent the transaction of the public business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that the Sergeant-at-Arms is having the warrants prepared.

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman from Minnesota will look around he will see that a great many Democrats are present.

Mr. TAWNEY. There are a few Democrats present.

Mr. SABATH. About 100.

Mr. TAWNEY. And 150 Republicans.

Mr. JAMES. That is, if the gentleman from Minnesota can be counted as 100. There are, perhaps, 10 besides himself on his side of the House.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OLMSTED. Is this question debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Almost anything seems to be in order, if it is not the transaction of business.

Mr. OLMSTED. I want to hear the gentleman from Kentucky for about an hour.

Mr. JAMES. I am not in the habit of addressing the House except when a majority of the House are present to hear me.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, it is now twenty-one minutes after 3 o'clock in the morning. There are 44 Members in the Hall. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. OLMSTED. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 40.

Accordingly the motion was rejected.

Subsequently,

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JAMES. The House of Representatives finds itself in the situation at this time of being under a call of the House. Warrants have been issued, as we have been informed, for absent Members. We should like to know from the Speaker what results have been obtained, what report the Sergeant-at-Arms has made relative to the order, and whether or not he is proceeding to arrest the absent Members and bring them here?

Mr. CLAYTON. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that it is now a quarter of 4 o'clock, and there has been plenty of time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that warrants have been issued, and they are in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and that his deputies are out performing their duty, endeavoring to bring in absent Members.

Mr. BURLESON. The question is, Has any report been made?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Several gentlemen have come in.

Mr. JAMES. The hotels are within easy access of the Capitol, and it appears to us that the Sergeant-at-Arms at this time ought to be able to report some progress in attempting to get the membership here, or a sufficient number to transact the public business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say that the Sergeant-at-Arms has reported some progress. A number of gentlemen have come in at the instance of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I inquire of the Speaker how many have come in since the order of arrest was issued?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Five Members, as the Chair is informed.

Mr. BURLESON. Five Members in an hour.

Mr. CLAYTON. At that rate, possibly, by 2 o'clock to-morrow afternoon there may be a quorum of Republicans present.

Mr. JAMES. Is it not the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms, under this call, to report to the House as he arrests Members, and to present them at the bar of the House and call the attention of the Speaker to the fact?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the practice of the House under its present rules, Members are not arrested and compelled to come to the bar of the House so as to be excused. They report to the Clerk of the House as they come in, and their presence is noted. Five gentlemen have come in since the call was instituted and have reported to the Clerk and had their names added to the list.

Mr. JAMES. May I inquire whether those who were absent were presented at the bar of the House as required by the rule?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not done unless the Member is arrested on a warrant.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest that the call of the House to-day has proceeded further than the call of the House has ever proceeded in recent times. An order has been made authorizing the Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest absent Members and bring them before the bar of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Warrants have been issued and are in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The Sergeant-at-Arms is not presenting any Member before the bar of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms is in the performance of his duty and these gentlemen have reported here.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. It seems to me that we have gone beyond that stage of ordinary procedure when there is a call of the House. The Clerk continues the call and allows Members when they come in to answer to the roll, and no further proceedings are taken under the call. Having gone beyond the stage the House has issued an order to the Sergeant-at-Arms directing that warrants be issued and placed in his hands, commanding him to bring in absent Members and present them before the bar of the House.

I ask, What proceedings have been taken under the order? Five Members have come in, but no one has been presented before the bar of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say that the old practice of the House of bringing Members in and having them presented at the bar of the House and being excused was abolished by the adoption of the new rule, which allows Members to come in and vote or answer to their names without being formally excused.

Mr. JAMES. May I ask when that rule was adopted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As I recollect, it was in the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. JAMES. I remember vividly the fact that a gentleman from a certain State in the Union was presented at the bar of the House since I came here, and I came here in the Fifty-eighth Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair may be mistaken in the particular Congress in which the rule was adopted. The Chair recollects, however, that the old practice was to bring Members in and present them at the bar of the House, and they had to be excused, but under the new practice they are entitled to vote if there be a question pending, and if there be no question pending they are entitled to have their names recorded by the Clerk as they come in, and are not required to be formally excused.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, since I came here in the Fifty-fifth Congress I have been brought in twice. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAMES. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JAMES. Does it not depend on whether or not the Member comes voluntarily, or whether he is brought in by the Sergeant-at-Arms as to whether or not he should be presented at the bar of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair presumes that if a Member comes in under compulsion in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms it would probably be necessary that he should be excused.

Mr. BURLESON. But no Member has presented himself voluntarily.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes; five Members have come in.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is it not a fact that the five Members who have come in are all Democrats and the Republicans are still in hiding in order not to have a quorum present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to ask the names of the five gentlemen who have come in, and then I will draw the inference that the Republicans are hiding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the Clerk can ascertain the names he can state them. The Clerk informs the Chair that he does not remember who they were.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, were they not Mr. GOLDFOGLE, Mr. GORDON, Mr. FLOOD, Mr. BROUSSARD, and two or three other Democrats? Does it not happen that every one of them is a Democrat, and not a single Republican has come in here voluntarily or been arrested?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not informed on that matter.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is not the breaking of a quorum here to-night in pursuance of an agreement by the managers of the Republican party or the Republican machine?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CLAYTON. We have been trying all day to get some parliamentary information from the Speaker. For more than twenty hours we have tried and could not get any.

Mr. BURLESON. We were trying to convey some information to him.

Mr. CLAYTON. No; we were trying to get a parliamentary expression.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. I do not desire to limit the inquiry to some parliamentary question. I would like to know if the Republican managers know anything about the situation here to-night that may enlighten the country?

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JAMES. I understand the present occupant of the chair has been a Member of this House more than twenty years. I would like to inquire if he has ever observed during all his experience a situation like this, where the minority is ready to transact business and the majority is away, where we have to send for them and arrest them in order to perform the public business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JAMES. I think it is.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I desire, in continuation of the remarks I made a little while ago in connection with the bringing in of absent Members, to call the attention of the Chair to this precedent, and I read now from volume 4 of Hinds's Precedents, page 135, under the head "Proceedings of arrest of Members and arraignment at the bar under section 4 of Rule XV for securing attendance of a quorum."

On May 28, 1906, the House was considering the bill (S. 1243) providing for compulsory education in the District of Columbia, and on a division on the passage of the bill it appeared that there was no quorum present.

Thereupon the Speaker ordered a call of the House under section 4 of Rule XV.

During the call the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared and said:

"Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the rules of the House and the warrant of the Speaker, I present at the bar of the House under arrest Mr. Buckman and Mr. RUCKER."

The Speaker pro tempore said:

"The gentlemen will be noted as present under the rule and discharged from arrest."

Thereupon the Speaker interrogated each gentleman as to whether or not he desired to vote, and each having stated that he did, their names were called and they voted.

The same procedure was had as to other gentlemen brought in under arrest.

Mr. JAMES. That is what I referred to a moment ago.

Mr. CLAYTON. But, Mr. Speaker, if I may interrupt the gentleman, let me say that as soon as those patriotic Democrats, five or six of them, were notified that their presence was necessary here they came voluntarily. The fact is that the Sergeant-at-Arms, as diligent as he is, scouring the whole city of Washington, has been unable to find one single Republican.

Mr. HARDWICK. He has not got anybody at all.

Mr. CLAYTON. Probably at an expense of some five or six or seven hundred dollars in hiring carriages, going around looking for them. I tell you it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, in all fairness, that when a Republican conspiracy is formed to hide out and to break a quorum it is utterly impossible for the most diligent Sergeant-at-Arms to find a Republican absentee. I do not believe that all the sleuths we read about in the detective stories could find these absent Republicans tonight.

Mr. JAMES. It is very much to be regretted, as it retards the public business.

Mr. CLAYTON. A Sherlock Holmes could not, with all his great detective ability, have found one. An adequate portrayal of a detective competent for this work would make the story File No. 113, by the great French detective writer, Gaboriau, seem as simple as a child's prattle. I tell you it is hard to head a Republican when he makes up his mind to defeat any righteous action on the part of the House.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. The gentleman means a regular Republican.

Mr. CLAYTON. I mean, of course, one of these so-called regulars. Of course I excuse from the limits of my remarks the patriotic insurgents. They want to do business here tonight and want to help us. I know of one hope that breaks upon my vision, and I believe that the country has realized that there is one fair expectation, and that is that next November a majority of the representatives of the people will be sent here, and those Representatives will be willing to do business during the day and, if necessary, to sacrifice comfort and convenience, even at the midnight hour or at this hour in the morning, when the clock now is about to strike 4—willing to come here and do business. Some gentlemen suggests that the clock does not strike. Like the Speaker, the clock is dumb. [Laughter and applause.]

For hours and hours we have been waiting here trying to get an expression from the Speaker, but we have obtained nothing but a masterful silence. We hear about eloquence, and about learned expositions of great questions, parliamentary and otherwise. I have been here some years in Washington, and some eighteen hours in this session or longer, and I have heard a great deal of eloquence and some very fine specimens of argumentation, but never have I seen anything equal to the masterful, forceful silence of the Speaker of this House in declining to rule on a plain, simple, parliamentary proposition, about which he had made up his mind long, long ago. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FOELKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that we now take a recess until 11.55 o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would say to the gentleman from New York that it requires a quorum to take a recess.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I was addressing myself to this enlightened audience, and I submit respectfully to the Chair——

Mr. OLMSTED. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama have permission to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am obliged to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] always knows a good thing when he sees it, and he is especially delighted when he hears a good thing.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman from New Jersey has the floor.

Mr. CLAYTON. I thought I had the floor. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon. Mr. Speaker, I offer my profound apologies to the House of Representatives and my regards and regrets to the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey that I should have so long trespassed upon the time that he would have used so valuably for the enlightenment of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt the Chair can rule upon the point raised by me without any difficulty.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order for me to move that proceedings under this call of the House be vacated?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would not, the Chair thinks.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The Chair could not receive any motion, even if no one raised the point of order? I move that the proceedings under this call of the House be vacated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the Chair can not entertain the motion.

Mr. JAMES. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JAMES. Has the Chair ruled upon the point of order that has been raised? I should like to know if the Speaker is ready to rule upon the point of order that has been raised as to whether or not the Norris resolution was in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not able to inform the gentleman as to that.

Mr. JAMES. Well, I should like to know who is.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that proceedings under the call be vacated.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. FOELKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until 11.55.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not entertain a motion of that character when there is no quorum present.

Mr. FOELKER. But no one has raised the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The roll call shows that no quorum is present.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is the reason we are here.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order for us to inquire of the Sergeant-at-Arms what progress has been made in attempting to procure the presence of a quorum in this House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Well, that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be requested to report to the House what progress he has made in attempting to procure a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But no business can be done in the absence of a quorum. The Chair can not entertain any motion except one motion, and that is to adjourn.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I should like to suggest to the Chair that it is certainly in order for us to ascertain what movements have been made and what progress has been made in the effort to obtain a quorum here. Suppose the Sergeant-at-Arms, Mr. Speaker, should refuse to obey the mandate and direction of this House to go forth and arrest Members and bring them here to constitute a quorum in order that public business may be performed. Are we, therefore, because the Sergeant-at-Arms may, forsooth, refuse to obey the orders of this House, to sit here all night long without a majority of this House in order to transact the public business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that he is informed upon good authority that warrants have been issued and that they are in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms and his deputies are out in an endeavor to serve those warrants.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAUGEN. How many Members have been brought in under arrest under these warrants?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No Members have been brought in under arrest; those who have come have come voluntarily.

Mr. HAUGEN. And it is now 4 o'clock in the morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is aware of that.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, do I understand the Chair to rule that the House did not have the authority to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to appear before the House and inform the House what efforts and progress have been made in attempting to secure a quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, without any knowledge as to any precedent, thinks it would be within the power of the parties present, although not a quorum, to ascertain from the Sergeant-at-Arms what progress he has made.

Mr. JAMES. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in view of the ruling of the Chair, which I think is eminently correct, I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be called before the bar of the House, that we may ascertain what progress and efforts he has made to obtain a quorum in this House to transact the public business, if any.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the Sergeant-at-Arms be required to come to the bar of the House and report what progress he has made, if any.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. What officer should we send for the Sergeant-at-Arms?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Democratic whip be requested to notify the Sergeant-at-Arms of the resolution which has just been adopted by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] indicate by name the party he desires to have sent?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. BELL of Georgia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas moves that Mr. BELL of Georgia be requested to find the Sergeant-at-Arms——

Mr. BURLESON. Or Mr. GARNER of Texas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the gentleman's motion?

Mr. BURLESON. That Mr. BELL of Georgia and Mr. GARNER of Texas——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Be requested to do what?

Mr. BURLESON. Be requested to notify the Sergeant-at-Arms of the resolution which has just been adopted by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] moves that Mr. BELL of Georgia and Mr. GARNER of Texas be requested to ask the Sergeant-at-Arms to report to the House what progress he has made——

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, the Sergeant-at-Arms is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (continuing). And notify the Sergeant-at-Arms of the action of the House.

Mr. BELL of Georgia and the Sergeant-at-Arms, Mr. Casson, appeared at the bar of the House.

Mr. BELL of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, this is the Sergeant-at-Arms before the bar of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will put the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will request the reading clerk of the House to inform the Sergeant-at-Arms of the action of the House.

The READING CLERK (Mr. Lampson). The House has directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to report what progress he has made or what action he has taken, if any, to bring in absent Members.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. I have four automobiles out, one with a minority deputy and three with other deputies, and they are having a hard time. But I hear from them every once in a while. I have just instructed one of them to go to the bedrooms of the Members themselves and get them out. I did that not five minutes ago.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Sergeant-at-Arms a question.

Mr. BURLESON. We have not heard the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks any question to be propounded to the Sergeant-at-Arms must be authorized by the House and not propounded by an individual Member.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I move that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] be permitted to interrogate the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Iowa will indicate what the question is——

Mr. HAUGEN. My question will be, If the Sergeant-at-Arms has made an effort to bring the Members here? That is the question we are entitled to know.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks to be permitted to propound to the Sergeant-at-Arms the question he has indicated.

Mr. HAUGEN. And I may have another question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the Sergeant-at-Arms state to the House the number of men that have been brought to the bar?

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. I have four deputies——

Mr. HAUGEN. That is not my question. Answer my question.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. They have not reported yet.

Mr. HAUGEN. What number of Members have you got to come in here?

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. I do not know the number, because they may have come in while I was in my room.

Mr. HAUGEN. How many have been brought in?

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. I do not know.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a matter of record.

Mr. HAUGEN. If it is of record, I think we can be enlightened.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. They came right in, and reported to the House.

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, how many have you brought in?

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. I have not brought in any.

Mr. HAUGEN. How many have your four deputies brought in?

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. That I can not tell.

Mr. HAUGEN. You know nothing about it?

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. They have not reported to me.

Mr. HAUGEN. What effort have you made to bring Members before the bar of the House?

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. I have tried to do what I could by sending out the deputies.

Mr. HAUGEN. Have you sent them to the hotels of the cities?

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. I sent them to all the hotels of the cities. I have just instructed one of them to report.

Mr. HAUGEN. Who are those deputies?

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. F. N. Weaver; Joe Bernard, a special official here in the House; Paul Porter, minority deputy; and John Hollinsworth.

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, you state that you have no knowledge of the whereabouts of these Members?

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. I have not.

Mr. HAUGEN. Then, your deputies are searching for these Members?

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Yes, sir; and they will get them and bring them in.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order.

Mr. HAUGEN. I call your attention to the fact that it is a quarter after 4 Friday morning. At what hour did you begin the search?

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. I think it was about 2 o'clock.

Mr. HAUGEN. Two hours and a quarter.

Mr. JAMES. I would like to ask the Sergeant-at-Arms a question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the gentleman from Kentucky be empowered to ask the Sergeant-at-Arms a question.

Mr. JAMES. I should like to ask the Sergeant-at-Arms whether or not in the search of two hours and a half by him and his four deputies he has only been able to produce in this House five Members?

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. When they come back with their automobiles they will bring them in.

Mr. JAMES. Then you have not presented any at the bar of the House?

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. I have not presented any.

Mr. JAMES. So that from 2 o'clock in the morning the efforts of yourself and four deputies have been productive of no results?

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Not any great results.

Mr. JAMES. No result.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Oh, yes; seven Members have come up here and answered the roll call.

Mr. JAMES. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair. How many Members do we lack of having a quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Thirty-five.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call of the House be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that that motion requires the presence of a quorum.

Mr. LENROOT. I observe in paragraph 3038 of Hinds's Precedents that—

A quorum is not required on a motion to suspend further proceedings under a call of the House. On September 10, 1890, during a call of the House, a motion was made that the House adjourn. On this question there were—yeas 58 and 92 nays. The Chair announced that there were 172 Members present, a quorum. Then, a motion being made by Mr. Nils P. Haugen, of Wisconsin, that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with, there were—132 yeas, 15 nays, and 188 not voting. Mr. Charles T. O'Ferrall, of Virginia, made the point of order that no quorum was present. The Speaker pro tempore overruled the point of order, on the ground that the former proceedings had disclosed the presence of 172 Members, more than a quorum, and that a motion to dispense with all further proceedings under a call did not require a quorum for its adoption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if that was not a case where upon the call of the House the presence of a quorum had been ascertained?

Mr. LENROOT. On a previous roll call; but the pending roll call had developed that there was not a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was the roll call on the motion to dispense with further proceedings?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; there were 132 yeas and 15 nays, less than a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman will note this difference: That was a case where upon a call of the House a quorum was disclosed. A motion was then made to dispense with further proceedings under the call. Upon that motion a quorum did not appear, and the Chair held that a quorum having already appeared on the call of the House, it was not necessary that there should be a quorum to dispense with the call.

Mr. LENROOT. The Chair also held that on a motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call a quorum was not necessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not necessary on that vote, but before the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call can be entertained there must have been disclosed the presence of a quorum on the call of the House. In other words, you can not vacate your call until you have succeeded in getting a quorum. Then upon a motion the further proceedings under the call may be dispensed with without a quorum.

Mr. LENROOT. In that case a quorum was not present when the motion was made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; but a quorum was present in answer to the preceding call of the House. A quorum being present, as disclosed by the call, a motion was then made to dispense with further proceedings under the call; but the authority that the gentleman cited is not an authority that would justify the Chair in entertaining a motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call while the call of the House now being made discloses the absence of a quorum. Of course the Chair would very much prefer to entertain the gentleman's motion if he thought it was in order.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that thirty minutes be given to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BYRD].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would say to the gentleman that unanimous consent can no more be given than can a motion to proceed to any other business. The Chair has no doubt that the House would be very much gratified to listen to the gentleman for more than thirty minutes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to consume the time of the House when there is so much business before it, but I want to ask the Speaker how long are we presumed to remain here for the Sergeant-at-Arms to make a return of one Republican before the bar of this House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is unable to answer the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I would ask the Chair, then, if he can tell me, in view of the fact that the Sergeant-at-Arms has sent out four of his deputies in four automobiles at great expense for nearly three hours and has not succeeded in finding a single Member, how long, in the judgment of the Chair, will it take to find 35 Members?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a problem the Chair is not able or called upon to solve.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If the Chair will permit me, then, with all deference and respect, I will inquire if the Chair has any information as to the whereabouts of the Republican Members and where they keep themselves at this hour in the morning? If the Chair could tell the Sergeant-at-Arms, he might have better luck.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is unable to answer that question either.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it does seem to me that we need somebody to help run the affairs of this House, and need that somebody pretty badly. The Chair and everybody else must take judicial notice of the fact that with the four automobiles, which the Sergeant-at-Arms says he has sent out, his deputies could have gone to every hotel in this town and waited at least one hour for a man to get up out of bed and dress himself and bring him to this Capitol, and have had him here long ago.

Mr. JAMES. I would suggest that perhaps the absence of the Republican Members of this House might be accounted for by the fact that the Washington Post of this morning, March 18, which I have just received, at twenty minutes to 5 o'clock, says a great battle is raging about Speaker CANNON. Perhaps the absent Republicans have gone to the rescue of the Speaker. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. For the entertainment of the Members present during the wait on the Sergeant-at-Arms, I request that the Clerk be directed to read to us the editorial in the Washington Post.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio first addressed the Chair.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that before I left the Chamber, at about 12 o'clock, I consulted the "whip" and understood if I got a pair it would be all right. I made a pair in the regular way with a live Democrat, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LATTA], and then went to my room at the Willard Hotel and went to bed, just where all good Republicans ought to be at this hour in the morning.

Mr. JAMES. They will be there after next November. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. That may be, but I do not believe the revolutionary proceedings attempted to-day will aid the Democratic party in any way.

Mr. JAMES. I think myself that the returns next November election will send them earlier than they went to-night.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Well, we do not take our instructions or fears from that side of the House. Having regularly taken a pair at about 12 o'clock at night from a good, live Democrat of good standing, and having delivered it to the pair clerk and gone to my hotel and retired for the night, I did not feel very comfortable on being roused up in less than two hours and rudely ordered to return to the House.

Mr. JAMES. I make the point of order that the man who stops at the Willard Hotel is not entitled to make a pair with a Democrat. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. My reply to that is that the Willard is just as cheap a place as any other first-class hotel in Washington, if you do not drink or call for other extras.

Mr. JAMES. I could tell better if the gentleman would tell me what he is paying for board. It may be that the gentleman is getting some rebate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say to the gentleman, in answer to his inquiry as to why he was brought here, that, in pursuance of an order of the House, the Sergeant-at-Arms was requested to bring in absent Members. So far as the matter of pairs is concerned, that is a matter not recognized by the rules of the House; it is purely a private matter between Members.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. A further inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Why do we have a pair clerk and why do we have a "whip?"

Mr. JAMES. The business of the "whip" seems to be to keep Republican Members away.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say that the matter of making pairs is an individual matter which has grown up into a custom so far as to be recognized by the House by the publication of the pairs in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and by reading them from the Clerk's desk, but there is no provision in the rules for pairs.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, a further parliamentary inquiry. I am here in pursuance of a rude call at my door by some one who said he had a warrant from this House for me. What is my status?

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. I want to know whether I am a prisoner or not. [Laughter.] Possibly I have no right to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. I decline to yield to anybody until I know whether I am under arrest.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is not under arrest.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Thanks. I was paired with a good Democrat——

Mr. JAMES. Who was it?

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Let me get through with my remarks. I want to know by what right, when a Member has taken this precaution and gone to his hotel and retired like a gentleman, the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be sent to his rooms in a public hotel to announce in the early hours of the morning in loud tones that he is under arrest, and that he must appear, without the usual courtesy of a call by telephone.

Mr. OLMSTED. Who made the motion for the warrant?

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. I want to know that. Who made the motion that I should be thus summoned, if not physically arrested? I regard this as a serious matter.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman if they brought him here in an automobile?

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. No; I paid my own fare, as I always do.

Mr. JAMES. If that is the fact——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor and is entitled to the protection of the Chair.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Who issued the warrant for absent Members?

Mr. SABATH. The Speaker did.

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, I do not know. Somebody may have forged his name.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Well, I do not believe JOE CANNON would go into such small business. [Laughter.] I do not have the greatest respect for him; I have never received any courtesies from him, but I do not believe that he would sign a warrant to arrest me at 4 o'clock in the morning, expecting it to be served, unless the House required it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Maybe it is all a mistake.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. I want to know if it is all a mistake.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I suppose it is a mistake; yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I would like to know if the Sergeant-at-Arms exhibited the warrant to the gentleman?

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. No; I would not let him in my rooms. They were my common-law castle, and I did not choose to admit him.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Maybe he did not have a warrant. Maybe it was a false arrest.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. That is my inquiry. Somebody suggests that it was a false arrest, and I want to know.

Mr. JAMES. I would suggest that the gentleman has a right of action to sue for damages, and he should sue the Republicans of this House for not staying here and maintaining a quorum.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. I am occupying some of the valuable time of the House, but much against my own wishes.

Mr. KITCHIN. The floor leader did it.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Thinking I was an insurgent? Well, I have known him to make worse mistakes than that. [Laughter and applause.] I insurge when I feel like it, and I do not insurge when I do not feel like it; but I want to say I do not feel much like insurgency to-night after witnessing the revolutionary attempt made here by Democrats to impede and set aside important legislation and throw the House into disorder merely because they can not rule it.

Mr. JAMES. They think you slipped away to avoid voting.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. No; I did not, and never do, dodge anything; I am not of the dodging kind. My record here is perfect on that point. I voted against the old rules and helped to secure calendar Wednesday, and I voted to override the Speaker's decision, which I thought would destroy it. I want to know who made the motion.

Several VOICES. TAWNEY.

Mr. WEBB. He is under arrest.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Well, I will go on his bond. [Laughter.] I desire to say I do not see the Speaker about. Where is he? [Cries of "In jail; he is arrested!"]

Where do they keep their prisoners? I am told I am the only one arrested. [Laughter.] I want to know about this. Is it possible, as suggested, that I am the only one? Now, Mr. Speaker, I have taken up the time of the House for a short time simply because I did not think it was engaged in any important business at this hour in the morning.

Several VOICES. Five o'clock.

A MEMBER. St. Patrick's Day in the morning.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. No; the morning after St. Patrick's Day. [Laughter.] Here was a man knocking at the door of my rooms——

Mr. JAMES. Name him.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH (continuing). And announcing that he had a warrant for me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Ohio that on a call of the House 154 Members responded, that there was not a quorum, and thereupon on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], a call of the House was ordered. The Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to go out and bring in absent Members. Warrants were drawn and signed by the Speaker and the Clerk, and put in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms. The Sergeant-at-Arms, or one of his deputies probably, served the warrant on the gentleman from Ohio, and that was done by order of the House.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Was anybody included in that warrant but myself? [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state warrants were issued for over 200 Members.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Who else was arrested then but me?

Several MEMBERS. Nobody.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio was not arrested.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. I know Members who live nearer the House than I do, and I want to know where they are now. If not found, as I was at my hotel with my family, where are they if there has not been discrimination against me?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No exception was made in the case of the gentleman from Ohio. He was not arrested.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, in view of the explanation made by the gentleman from Ohio, and the fact that he stops at the Willard Hotel, and the further fact that he had a good pair with a good Democrat, as he says, and only left at 12 o'clock, while the fine is usually $500 to $1,000 for absence, I move that we exonerate him and accept his excuse.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. I decline to yield for any such suggestion. I insist that the orders of the House be carried out impartially on all.

Mr. JAMES. I expect the man who signed the warrant is asleep somewhere.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Then I want him brought in.

Mr. ASHBROOK. They did not arrest me, but just telephoned me to come here.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. I have two telephones in my rooms; why did not they telephone me?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I can not tell; but they just telephoned me to come over, and did not serve any warrant on me.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. A further parliamentary inquiry, and a very serious one. I am paired with a Democrat. Can I vote or do anything else now?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. It is all off.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has answered "present" and was recorded. That is all that is required of him at this time.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Can I go back under that pair?

Mr. JAMES. I submit to the Chair that my motion to excuse the gentleman from Ohio is in order.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. The gentleman does not want any motion to be excused. I am here. If my pair is not good I will stay here, and if it is good I want to go back to my hotel, where Republicans ought to be at this time in the morning.

Mr. JAMES. It is daylight now, and I would suggest to the gentleman that all good farmers like himself ought to be awake.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. I regard it as an honor to be mistaken for a farmer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman would be liable to arrest if he left the House now. His presence is necessary in order to make a quorum.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. All right. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. JAMES. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that I would be very glad to take the floor, but we are so busy at this time hearing excuses of Republicans for being arrested on account of their absence from their duties that I am not disposed to take the floor at all and interrupt the business.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know how many we are short of a quorum now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that we are 25 short.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It has taken us about three hours and a half, I believe, to get in 10 Members. I would like to know how many more hours it will take to get the other 25.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to submit a parliamentary inquiry entirely seriously. Is there any time limit under the rules of this House when a presiding officer must submit a decision on a point of order made on a proposition? I would like to have that answered, and then, perhaps, I want to ask another.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no provision in the rules, of course, and the gentleman's parliamentary inquiry has no relation at all to the question of getting a quorum.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit another inquiry. If the presiding officer of the House can decline to decide a proposition before the House, can he not absolutely block, until the expiration of the term, any transaction of business in the House by refusing to pass upon a point of order that has been made?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is not a legislative session of the House. There is no House in session just now.

Mr. HAMLIN. There must be a House, I submit, Mr. Speaker, or else we could not adjourn, and we certainly could adjourn if we wanted to do it. I understand the Chair declines to answer the parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not answer the question.

Mr. HAMLIN. I submit this, Mr. Speaker, and I ask it in the utmost good faith, namely, it has been fifteen hours since the point of order was made and the Chair has shown no inclination to pass upon it, and it has occurred to me, seriously, that if he could decline to pass upon a point of order for fifteen hours, he could decline to pass upon it for fifteen months, and yet no other business can be transacted until that is out of the way.

Now, is it not within the power of the Speaker to absolutely block any legislation during the entire months that are to follow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Now, the Chair submits to the gentleman from Missouri that he is quite as capable of answering that question as is the Chair. It is not a parliamentary inquiry. There is no rule of the House upon the subject at all.

Mr. HAMLIN. I supposed that perhaps the long service of the gentleman who now occupies the chair would enable him to give us some information upon that point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman now occupying the chair has no information on that subject.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there may be stricken from the RECORD the debate which took place a little while ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the House in the absence of a quorum can not grant that request.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts ought to be acceded to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request can be made when the House has a quorum present. When there is not a quorum present the House has no control of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. If the House were to take an adjournment at the present moment, what would be the parliamentary status when the House reassembles at 12 o'clock as regards the point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Immediately after the reading of the Journal the Speaker's table might be cleared. There is a bridge bill on the Speaker's table and two pension bills, the District of Columbia bill and a land bill. So far as the resolution and the point of order pending are concerned, the status of the resolution and the point of order would be just the same as now. It would be unfinished business.

Mr. JAMES. A further parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. That is the opinion of the pro tempore Speaker, the present Speaker, Mr. DALZELL, of Pennsylvania?

Mr. CLAYTON. The present occupant of the chair.

Mr. JAMES. But the regular Speaker, Mr. JOSEPH G. CANNON, when he comes in, might he not set that opinion aside?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not likely.

Mr. JAMES. He has a perfect right to change that opinion if he desires, has he not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Undoubtedly. But the Chair has given an opinion which is based on the rules of the House.

Mr. JAMES. I know; but the Speaker of the House might differ from the construction given this question by the present occupant of the chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is possible, but highly improbable.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit a suggestion?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I think, inasmuch as the decision of the present occupant of the chair will be a matter of record, anybody who followed him in the chair in the morning would take cognizance of that statement.

Mr. JAMES. I have as great respect for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], the pro tempore Speaker, as the gentleman from Nebraska has, but I insist that any ruling made by the pro tempore Speaker is not binding upon the regular Speaker, nor is it binding upon any person the regular Speaker may call to the chair.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the gentleman, that even the present occupant of the chair can make a different ruling if in the chair; but it is as binding upon any other man in the chair as it is upon the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. JAMES. I should like to ask the gentleman from Nebraska if he does not think, as it is 5.15 now in the morning of the 18th of March, that we might obtain a quorum, and that we might go on and perform our duties—it will be daylight in a few minutes—rather than adopt this motion for the purpose of adjournment when nobody can get any sleep or get any of the benefits of the rest of the night? This matter ought not to be postponed; and as we have stayed up all night, and have stayed here to fight this battle for the people, we ought to have an opportunity to dispose of it.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit me? I would like to suggest this: If we do not entertain it, there is nothing gained by waiting, because under the present parliamentary status the decision on the point of order rests entirely with the Speaker, and we will do no business from now until 12 o'clock. All the other people have gone and are resting sweetly in their beds, and are permitted to remain there.

Mr. JAMES. With the greatest deference to the gentleman from Nebraska, for whom I have the greatest respect, I would suggest that these same gentlemen have been home peaceably sleeping all through the weary hours of this night, and we have been compelled to stay here. Does the gentleman think we ought, with but a short time now until day breaks, to go away from our duty? Ought we not to stay here and call them here on the warrants issued by this House to bring absentees here to perform their duties?

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the gentleman think the warrants issued by this House ought to be put in the hands of a Sergeant-at-Arms that will bring them here? [Applause.]

Mr. JAMES. I agree that it would be possible still to have a different Sergeant-at-Arms to carry out the mandates of this House, but not so long as the present situation remains.

Mr. NORRIS. But you are powerless to help the situation at present.

Mr. JAMES. I will say to the gentleman from Nebraska that that is the most pitiable plea, that the mandate issued to bring absent Members in for the purpose of performing the public duties for which they were elected can not be and will not be obeyed; if so, then I agree with him that somebody ought to be elected as Sergeant-at-Arms who will obey the mandates of the House and execute the orders of the House.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with that proposition. I do not believe that a fair, honest, diligent search has been made by the Sergeant-at-Arms. [Applause.]

Mr. JAMES. Certainly not.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe he has made a fair attempt to perform his duty or to carry out the mandate of this House; but I should like to say to the gentleman at the same time that we can not elect a new Sergeant-at-Arms before 12 o'clock, consequently, in my judgment, we are only keeping ourselves from rest while the others are resting, so that they can renew the fight at 12 o'clock to-day.

Mr. JAMES. I will say to the gentleman from Nebraska that so concerned am I for the people's rule of the Congress of the United States that I am willing to lose one night's sleep in order that that rule may be sustained. [Applause.]

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I am likewise willing to lose a night's sleep, and have already done so. It seems to me we have now demonstrated to the country, without remaining here any longer, that the wonderful power of the Speaker which we are trying to curb is absolutely in control, and that we will gain nothing by still longer having ourselves to suffer, while those who are trying to pervert the will of the House are quietly resting.

Mr. JAMES. But as the hour is now 5.20 o'clock on the morning of the 18th of March, and we have already been here all night long, while the gentleman and I saw the regular Republicans—the Cannonites—leave this Hall for the purpose of breaking a quorum, does the gentleman not think that we might take some steps by appointing deputies who might go forth with the warrants issued by this House, arrest and bring those gentlemen here, in order that we might proceed with the performance of the public business?

Mr. NORRIS. I would favor a resolution that would make a proper investigation of the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms, with a view of bringing him to the bar of this House on account of what I believe to be his misconduct in office.

Mr. JAMES. I want to say to the gentleman from Nebraska that I do not dispute his good faith in his effort to overthrow this tyranny that has held this House in its grasp for all these months. I honor the gentleman from Nebraska for the effort he has made in trying to liberate this House from the thraldom of Cannonism; but I say to him that in my judgment we can best subserve the great effort that we have made by staying in session until the hour of 12 o'clock arrives, as we have stayed here already all night and lost a night's sleep, and demonstrate to the country that we are willing to lose a night's sleep for a fight to liberate the people from the tyranny of one man.

Mr. NORRIS. I think we have already demonstrated that.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman from Nebraska a question.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman from Nebraska will further admit, I presume, that the Speaker heard nine hours' debate on this question and sat stubbornly and refused to rule on the question.

Mr. NORRIS. Everybody knows that.

Mr. JAMES. It was done plainly for the purpose of filibustering, in order that he might get absent Members here, fearing a test on the part of the Members then present in the House of Representatives.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. As I understand the parliamentary situation, if an adjournment should be taken now, the pending matter could not be reached again until after the House convened to-day at 12 o'clock and business on the Speaker's table was disposed of.

Mr. BURLESON. And pension bills disposed of.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Suppose in the disposition of any of those matters upon the Speaker's table a point of order should be made. Is the gentleman prepared to say just when that point of order would be disposed of?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Might it not be delayed indefinitely?

Mr. NORRIS. I understand, but at the same time the present point of order could be deferred, so I do not see that anything would be gained.

Mr. JAMES. If the gentleman will permit me, the same proposition might have been made to the House at the hour of 12 o'clock; but if in the faithful performance of our duty to our country and for our people we have stayed here all night, does the gentleman not think that at the hour of 5.30 in the morning we might continue to demonstrate to the country that we are still here, willing and ready and able and anxious to perform the public duties of the House?

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman from Nebraska permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not the floor.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. JAMES. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLMSTED. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he is in favor of the conservation of our natural resources? If so, does he not think it would be better to let us go home and go to bed for a few hours?

Mr. JAMES. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that in the battle of humanity the loss of one night's sleep does not affect the conservation of my natural resources. [Laughter.]

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that we are discussing now questions to enlighten the Chair, and I want to ask the question, that when we are discussing that question for the purpose of discussing as near as we can the Chair how to rule, should not the Speaker himself be in the chair, instead of a part of the time being out of this Chamber and a part of the time being in other places, where he does not hear or understand what the discussion is?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does all of that business on the Speaker's table come in ahead of this question in the ordinary procedure of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It might.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One of them, I understand, is a District of Columbia bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that it is a little bill relating to some claim.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And these bills might be made to take up two or three days of time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They would be entirely within the power of the House. The question of consideration could be raised at any time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to inquire—I am not certain that it is a parliamentary inquiry—how many of these bills there are there?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are seven bills.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And that could very easily be made to take one parliamentary day?

Mr. JAMES. Seven days.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. On the question of consideration you could have a roll call on every one of them, if not two.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Is not this war-claims day under the rule of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say to the gentleman that Friday is assigned to war claims, but a motion to take up that business is not in order until after the disposition of unfinished business.

Mr. JAMES. What is the difference in the parliamentary status of adjournment until 12 o'clock noon and a recess until 11.55 to-day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The recess would continue the legislative day.

Mr. JAMES. And that would be this question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. So far as the question pending before the House is concerned, the question of order, as the Chair has stated, in the judgment of the Chair the status would be what it is now.

Mr. JAMES. That is absolutely correct, in my opinion. So if we take a recess this question would come up, and if we take an adjournment other business might block it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The business on the Speaker's table might be taken up.

Mr. JAMES. And that might take days to dispose of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is quite as competent to judge of that as the Chair.

Mr. JAMES. I hardly think so; I am willing to assert that it would take many days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that they are not important bills and would not take much time. The question of consideration could be raised.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. If it takes the Speaker sixteen hours on a point of order not to decide it, how long would it take the House on six or seven bills? [Laughter.]

Mr. JAMES. Well, I would like to refer that question to some one wiser than I.

Mr. HAUGEN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Would a motion to discharge the present Sergeant-at-Arms and elect his successor be in order at this time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would not.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, would a motion be in order that the House appoint additional deputies to execute the orders of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not in the absence of a quorum. No business is in order.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, the House has a right to transact such business as is necessary to obtain the presence of a quorum, and if, in the opinion of the Members of the House present, who constitute the House even if not a quorum, the present officers are not discharging their duty, undoubtedly the House would have a right to proceed to the appointment of officers who will discharge that duty, and I invoke a ruling at the hands of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is plain to the Chair that that would be adding to the officers of the House, and of course such business could not be done in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. If the Chair is correct in that position and the present officers of the House were to flatly refuse to execute the mandate of the House, how would a quorum ever be obtained?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When the House has obtained a quorum——

Mr. HARDWICK. Have we not the right to force attendance of Members in order to make a quorum? And have we not the right to take each and every measure that is necessary, in our judgment, to secure that purpose and to carry it out?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. It seems to me there ought not to be any difficulty about that. They have brought in one Member, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH], and they have been at it only five hours. They are doing pretty well.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to submit a privileged motion. I move that the House appoint Mr. Joseph Sinnott as Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms, with such force as he may employ to assist him to execute the mandate of this House previously made in this case, and force attendance of the absent Members.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I would like to suggest that he find the Sergeant-at-Arms and bring him in.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not know that it is necessary, although I want to repeat, before we vote, the argument I made. It is ridiculous to say that this House has not the power to employ men to execute its mandates on this subject; that is, securing and forcing the attendance of a quorum here, no matter if it can do nothing else on earth, and unless we have that power we are helpless, if our own servants refuse to obey us. We might sit here a year, as has been suggested, helpless and powerless because some underling refuses to obey the mandate of this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is now proceeding under the terms of the rule of the House, which the Chair will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the absence of a quorum, 15 Members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members, and in all calls of the House the doors shall be closed, the names of the Members shall be called by the Clerk, and the absentees noted; and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may, by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested wherever they may be found by officers to be appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms for that purpose, and their attendance secured and retained; and the House shall determine upon what condition they shall be discharged. Members who voluntarily appear shall, unless the House otherwise directs, be immediately admitted to the Hall of the House, and they shall report their names to the Clerk, to be entered upon the Journal as present.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the words of the rule itself. It says that we have the power to enforce the attendance of these men, to use whatever means, in our judgment, are necessary to accomplish that purpose, and if it is evident, as I believe it is evident, to this House that the means we now have are insufficient for that purpose and will not accomplish it, then we have the right, under the rule just read, to employ such means as are necessary and will accomplish that purpose.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the language contained in section 5 of Article I of the Constitution:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, the terms, and qualifications of its own Members, and a majority of each (House) shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members, in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide.

Now, in pursuance of this a rule has been prescribed that, I apprehend, this being a constitutional provision, less than a majority may proceed under it in such manner as it may be provided.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I would just like to suggest, in that connection, that whenever a grant of power is made, there goes with the grant of power the means that may be needed to make it effective, as has just been pointed out by the gentleman from Tennessee. We have a grant of power in the Constitution entirely apart from anything that may be contained in the rules, that we derive from the organic law, the necessary means, the right to use the necessary means to make effective the power that is granted by that section.

Mr. HARDWICK. One other word before the Chair rules. Just a few moments ago the present occupant of the chair ruled that this House, or the Members who were present, less than a quorum, had the right to require a report from the Sergeant-at-Arms as to the progress of the work that he was then engaged in, to wit, the work of securing the attendance of a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is exactly the same proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not at all.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, may I cite the Chair to Hinds's Precedents, paragraph 2994, which reads as follows:

A quorum is not required on motions incidental to a call of the House. On August 26, 1890, a motion having been made to dispense with all further proceedings under the call, it resulted, on a roll call—yeas 127, nays 21.

Mr. William E. Mason, of Illinois, made the point of order that no quorum was present.

The Speaker pro tempore overruled the said point of order on the ground that a quorum was not required on any motion on a proposition touching the call of the House.

Is not the motion made by the gentleman a motion touching a call of the House, and is not that an incidental motion such as described in this precedent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this is not concerning a call of the House. This is a clear out-and-out proposition to increase the officers of the House. Now, it seems to the Chair that the error of the position assumed by the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Virginia is that they give to less than a quorum the power that belongs to a quorum of the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. To appoint temporary employees only.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It matters not. Now, under the constitutional provision, which was cited by the gentleman from Tennessee, the House enacted section 2 of Rule XV and prescribed the manner in which Members should be compelled to attend upon a call of the House, and specifically provided that it must be by order of a majority of those present; to be sent for and arrested, wherever they may be found, by officers to be appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms for that purpose. There is no doubt about the power of the House to call to the bar of the House the Sergeant-at-Arms, or to discharge the Sergeant-at-Arms, for that matter, when the House is in possession of its powers, having a quorum; but it is not in the power of less than a quorum to add to the officers of the House, especially in view of the fact that the rules specifically provide how this power of the House shall be exercised.

Now, the Chair would like to suggest to those gentlemen who have been here a number of years, the older Members of the House, that this is no unusual experience. It has always been found impossible, so far as the Chair's recollection goes, to obtain a quorum upon a call of the House at a very late hour, especially after midnight, and the Chair thinks it is not in order to entertain the motion.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SABATH. Then, in that respect the rules are defective.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk to the Speaker's table calls to the Chair's attention a footnote in volume 4, page 104, which the Clerk will please read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House, by sections 2 and 4 of Rule XV (see secs. 2982 and 3041 of this chapter), has provided for compelling attendance of absent Members. The Senate has a rule (sec. 3 of Rule V) which permits a majority of those present to "direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators." On February 24, 1879 (3d sess. 45th Cong., RECORD, p. 1856), the Senate was proceeding to order its Sergeant-at-Arms to compel the attendance of absent Senators and use all necessary means for that purpose, when a quorum appeared. On February 23, 1871 (3d sess. 41st Cong., Globe, p. 1592), the Senate debated at length its rule for securing attendance of absentees. On February 23, 1883 (2d sess. 47th Cong., RECORD, pp. 3178–3186), the Senate considered a proposition to compel the attendance of absent Senators, a Cabinet officer, at whose house several were dining, having denied admission to the officer of the Senate who was sent to "request" the attendance of absentees.

In the Senate it seems to have been held that under the Constitution there is no power to compel the attendance of absentees except at the first meeting of the Senate, and that for subsequent meetings the power must be given by a rule, as in the House. See statement of Senator Fessenden on May 4, 1864 (1st sess. 38th Cong., Globe, p. 2089).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. So that the House, having by rule provided, as it was authorized by the Constitution to do, for the presence of absent Members by a specific mode, it is not, in the opinion of the Chair, possible, with less than a quorum present, to increase the officers of the House.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Chair will permit me to submit something further on the question——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. In Hinds's Precedents, 3029, it says:

On February 19, 1894, during a call of the House Mr. Richard P. Bland, of Missouri, offered a resolution that the Sergeant-at-Arms arrest absent Members, that the order should continue in force beyond the adjournment of that day and until the further order of the House, and that a sufficient number of deputies be appointed to execute the order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was in the House.

Mr. LENROOT. The point was made that no quorum was present, and therefore it was not in order.

After debate, the Speaker pro tempore overruled the latter point, holding that the motion of Mr. Bland being a proceeding to compel the attendance of absent Members, and having been submitted pending a call of the House, a quorum was not required to decide the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was certainly true, because the constitutional provision is that less than a quorum can take such action as is necessary. The House is in full possession of its powers at the time it orders a call of the House for the purpose of making such call. What was done in the House in the case cited was part of the call of the House, which is authorized by the Constitution to be made by less than a quorum. But there is no authority for the proposition that, there being less than a quorum of the House present, it may increase the officers of the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. If, then, we should not have a faithful Sergeant-at-Arms, the House then, according to the rule and according to the opinion of the present occupant of the chair, would be absolutely at the mercy of its servant?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not the House, but less than a quorum of the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. Therefore there would be no way of compelling a quorum at any time in the future?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets every twenty-four hours.

Mr. HARDWICK. It might not have a quorum when it met again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is very dangerous to decide a legal proposition upon an extreme case.

Mr. HARDWICK. And the case supposed by the Chair is so extreme that, with all due respect to the decision of the Chair, I appeal from its decision.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Do I understand the Speaker to hold that if there is one less Member present than half of the entire House, the Sergeant-at-Arms, the servant of the House, has more authority than one-half of the House minus one?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then, is it not a fact that less than a quorum has more power in this House than the Sergeant-at-Arms has?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If that is the gentleman's inference.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am asking if that is not the effect of the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the judgment of the Chair, it is not.

Mr. HARDWICK. I respectfully ask for a vote on my appeal.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be again reported.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will state it orally, if it will satisfy the gentleman. It is that Mr. Joseph Sinnott be instructed to employ such assistance and all the means necessary in order to execute the order of the House previously made, in order to secure a quorum to attend to the public business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And the Chair rules that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia is not in order, and from that ruling of the Chair the gentleman from Georgia appeals. The question is, Shall the judgment——

Mr. OLMSTED. A parliamentary inquiry. Can the Chair entertain an appeal?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands it has been decided that an appeal may be had while a call of the House is in progress. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

The question was taken, and the decision of the Chair was overruled.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SABATH. Then, because the Sergeant-at-Arms failed in the attempt to bring the Members in, it is necessary that new warrants should issue?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Well, that is a question for the House to determine.

Mr. JAMES. I suggest to the Chair that warrants have already issued, have they not?

Mr. SABATH. Should new warrants issue?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a matter on which the Chair is not required to express an opinion.

Subsequently,

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Speaker be instructed to issue warrants authorizing Mr. Sinnott and his assistants to execute the order of the House. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. In the judgment of the Chair, is it necessary that this additional force should have other and additional warrants in order to enforce the attendance of Members?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a question the Chair would not like to commit itself on without some investigation. The gentleman from Georgia is quite as capable of answering that question as the Chair.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Ought not the assistants provided for be furnished with a copy of this order? That will furnish them the necessary authority.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, in order to remove any doubt, I move that warrants issue in the name of the Speaker, that they be delivered to the gentlemen appointed under the resolution just passed to execute the order of the House to secure the attendance of a quorum. I ask that it be done in the usual form and delivered to the gentlemen just appointed.

Subsequently,

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order. The regular order is to submit the motion made by the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands. The Chair is going to act in a moment. There is no special haste about it.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion made by the gentleman from Georgia is in precisely the same situation as the motion which the Chair held a moment ago to be out of order. In that case the Chair was overruled by the House. The Chair will hold in this case that the motion is out of order and permit the House to pass upon it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes have it, and the decision of the Chair is overruled. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Subsequently,

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to propound a query to the Chair. I would like to know if the warrants for absentees have been issued?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that they are being prepared as rapidly as possible.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The warrants are being issued?

Subsequently,

Mr. BURLESON. A parliamentary inquiry. How many Members do we lack of having a quorum?

The SPEAKER. Sixteen.

Subsequently,

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BURLESON. I desire to know whether the additional warrants authorized by the House to be intrusted to Mr. Joe Sinnott have been issued and signed by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The warrants have already been issued to the proper officer prescribed by the rules, made under the Constitution, and are in the hands of the proper officer, who the Chair has no doubt is proceeding under the rules, made by authorization of the Constitution, to arrest absentees.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, with due respect to the Speaker, the query propounded has not been answered. Has the warrant issued by the House——

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to be catechised by the gentleman touching this matter. The Chair will proceed under the Constitution, under the law, and under the rules, in compliance with the methods prescribed by the House.

Mr. BURLESON. With due respect to the presiding officer, I want to know whether the Speaker refuses to communicate to the House whether he has carried out the orders of the House with reference to the issuance of the warrant ordered to be intrusted to Mr. Joe Sinnott.

The SPEAKER. When the House has a quorum the Speaker will make a communication to the House for the information of the House.

Mr. BURLESON. Do I understand that the Speaker has ruled that he will not recognize the order of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not ruled as to a ministerial duty under the rules and the Constitution.

Mr. BURLESON. I could not hear the suggestion made by the parliamentary adviser of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker has complied with the order that the House with less than a quorum has authority to make under the rule——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. And the Chair does not care further at this time, without a quorum, to say more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, without a quorum there are certain purposes that a Member of the House is entitled to rise for. I desire to call the Speaker's attention to the fact that the House has one constitutional right that it can perform, even when a quorum is not present. That is the summoning of Members to attend the House.

The SPEAKER. And that has been done for every absentee who has not leave of absence under the order of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the Speaker will allow me, I understand that the House has ordered one of the employees of the House by special order to summon absentees.

The SPEAKER. Not the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Speaker will allow me, with all due respect, the House has a constitutional function that it can perform, even if a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. And it has performed that function in accordance with the rule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But under the Constitution it can perform that function as it pleases. There is no limitation in the Constitution as to how it shall summon the Members to be present here.

The SPEAKER. In this ministerial duty performed by the Speaker, and for which the Speaker or any officer would be responsible, the Speaker must determine for himself as to his duty in the performance of that ministerial function.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman, whom the Chair desires to treat with courtesy——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman always desires to treat the Speaker with courtesy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not even examined what precedents there are touching this matter. The Chair in the last few minutes has been examining, and so far as there are precedents the Chair is inclined to be convinced that the House having under the Constitution provided how less than a quorum can get a quorum, the proceedings of less than a quorum to get a quorum must be under the provisions made by the House. Now, the Chair may be wrong, but——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Chair allow me——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not exericse this ministerial duty otherwise than is provided by the rules made in compliance with the Constitution.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand that the Speaker declines to sign the warrant ordered by the House?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker states that he has already signed warrants for all absent Members, and has no reason to doubt that the warrants are being executed, ever since they have gone into the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. BURLESON. With due respect to the Speaker, I desire to propound this query: Has the Speaker signed the warrants to be intrusted to Joe Sinnott, as ordered by the House?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker has no knowledge of Joe Sinnott, and the Speaker desires to say nothing further than he has said until a quorum of the Houes appears.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the Speaker of the House——

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Wait a moment, until I state it, and then the Speaker will be able to determine. Is the Speaker of the House the Speaker of it when there is no quorum, the same as he is when there is a quorum?

The SPEAKER. Under very different limitations.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If the Speaker is Speaker of the House when there is no quorum, the same as he is when there is a quorum, then I submit that he should carry out the will of the House when there is no quorum the same as he should when there is a quorum.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. He ought to do it anyhow, on general principles.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker is under the constraint that he is bound by a rule of the House adopted when it had a quorum; and acting in this ministerial capacity, will be bound by that rule, and not by a request of the gentleman or a request of less than a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Speaker will allow me, I desire to read from the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to take——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am stating a parliamentary point of order—there is no business before the House.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to state this question: Section 2 of Rule XV reads as follows:

In the absence of a quorum, 15 Members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members, and in all calls of the House the doors shall be closed—

And so forth.

The SPEAKER. Continue the reading, please.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am reading from section 2 of Rule XV, that is a reenactment of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. OLMSTED. But the gentleman does not read all of it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This is the rule under which we are proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has only read a part of it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the Clerk to read it all.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. In the absence of a quorum, 15 Members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members, and in all calls of the House the doors shall be closed, the names of the Members shall be called by the Clerk, and the absentees noted; and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may, by order of majority of those present, be sent for and arrested, wherever they may be found, by officers to be appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms for that purpose, and their attendance secured and retained; and the House shall determine upon what condition they shall be discharged. Members who voluntarily appear shall, unless the House otherwise direct, be immediately admitted to the Hall of the House, and they shall report their names to the Clerk to be entered upon the Journal as present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, during the absence of the Speaker when he appointed the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] to act as Speaker pro tempore, the fact that Members were not being brought into the House under the formal call of the House, the House itself, or those present, passed a resolution that was recognized by the Speaker pro tempore, the gentleman designated by the Speaker, authorizing Joe Sinnott, one of the employees of the House, to serve certain warrants.

When that was done that was not the order of the Speaker, but it was the order of this House, acting within its constitutional limitations, for the purpose that the Constitution expressly says that any 15 Members of this House could perform. The question before the House is whether that order has been carried out, and it seems to me it is a very proper question, clearly within the powers of the House, notwithstanding a quorum was not present to compel a quorum to be present. It is very clear, Mr. Speaker—I do not make the charge—but it is very clear that if the Sergeant-at-Arms refused to obey the will of the membership of this House, acting within their constitutional limitations, that those Members, under the Constitution, would have a right to select or appoint the proper men to execute their will and bring in the absent Members of this House before the House, to constitute a quorum, in order that the business of the House might be transacted. It was the judgment of the House, if the House in its judgment believed that the Sergeant-at-Arms was thwarting the will of the House, and, after a reasonable time, was not producing absentees—I think it is clear that this House has the right to appoint such persons as it thought necessary to bring absent Members to the bar of the House. Now, I ask the Speaker to rule under these circumstances whether it was not within the power of less than a quorum, if it were 15 Members, to compel the attendance to this House by such means as the membership of this House saw fit to adopt?

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to put a question to the gentleman from Alabama from a purely legal standpoint.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. OLMSTED. The Constitution says that—

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, and a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized—

Not that it may itself do it without authorization, but a smaller number than a quorum may be authorized—to compel the attendance of absent Members in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide.

That is to say, the House, which requires a quorum to do business, must provide the manner by which less than a quorum may be authorized to compel the attendance of Members. The House has provided such a manner in that rule which the gentleman quoted. The second paragraph of the rule says, not reading the whole of it, that those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may, by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested wherever they may be found—by officers to be appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms for that purpose.

Now, admittedly no quorum being present, those who were present, less than a quorum, authorized, or attempted to authorize, Joseph Sinnott to make arrests of Members, and directed the Speaker to issue warrants to him for that purpose.

I ask the gentleman from Alabama if he would like to go on Joseph Sinnott's bond if he should on such warrant arrest people and bring them here, and they should bring suit for false arrest?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, there can be no question that where there is authority granted by the Constitution of the United States——

Mr. OLMSTED. But that authority is granted to the House, not to a number smaller than a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That stands above all the rules that this House can adopt, and the Constitution of the United States clearly, without any question or equivocation, authorized any 15 Members of this House to summon before the bar of this House the absentees and force a quorum here, and any rule that we adopt can not change the Constitution of the United States. Now, I say that if the Constitution of the United States authorizes 15 Members to summon a quorum, it does not mean that they have got to be appointed by some rule that some House has adopted. They are appointed by the Constitution.

Mr. OLMSTED. The Constitution says in such manner as the House shall provide.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, of course, the House that is present there then.

Mr. OLMSTED. No; it does not say that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, suppose the House met and there was no quorum here, under rules adopted, does the gentleman think because of that lack of a quorum it could not summon the absentees?

Mr. OLMSTED. I certainly think that without some previous authority of the House no 15 Members could cause Members to be arrested.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Constitution authorizes the summoning of Members here, does the gentleman think that the fathers of the Constitution would be so childish as to adopt a provision that did not intend to give this House the power to enforce its commands?

Mr. OLMSTED. The Constitution says the House may provide a manner to do it, and without such manner there is no authority under the Constitution, which just as clearly requires the presence of a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman knows as well as I do that the very first Congress that ever met met without a quorum.

Mr. OLMSTED. Did they arrest anybody?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; but they sent for them; and if they could send for them, they could arrest them.

Mr. OLMSTED. Well, I renew my question, whether the gentleman from Alabama would be willing to go on the bond of Joseph Sinott?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would have no hesitancy at all if it was under the order of this House. It is the only constitutional function the House can perform without a quorum, but it can perform that function just as well without a quorum as with a quorum. There can be no question about that. This House is a House to transact business, so far as summoning Members here is concerned, whether it has a quorum or not, and any action that this House takes to summon a quorum here is legal and authorized by the Constitution.

Mr. HARDY. If the proposition maintained by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] is correct, then, in case this House should happen to be without a quorum when the Sergeant-at-Arms was sick or happened to have died, this House would be absolutely powerless to secure a quorum, because the Sergeant-at-Arms, when the House had a quorum, had passed away; or, more possible, because the Sergeant-at-Arms might be sick or should absolutely refuse to execute the orders of the House. And for all time this House might remain without a quorum, because the Sergeant-at-Arms might sit in his office and refuse to exercise the order of the House as it was given to him. It seems to me we would be putting ourselves in an absurd position by saying that the Sergeant-at-Arms can refuse to execute the orders of the House made under the Constitution at his own sweet will and pleasure, and that this House can not bring a quorum to its floor by any means whatever. I believe that the Constitution intended that, for the purpose of securing a quorum, 15 Members should have all the powers of the full House; and if any rule of the House would operate to destroy that intention of the Constitution, that rule is void.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the question before us is this: During the absence of the present occupant of the chair, while the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] was presiding, the House ordered the issuance of certain warrants for absent Members, and in addition thereto ordered the Speaker to sign those warrants and intrust them to Joseph Sinnott for service. The question now is, whether the Speaker has carried out the mandates of the House and signed those warrants, and I rise to a question of parliamentary inquiry: Has the Speaker signed and delivered those warrants?

The SPEAKER. It is not a parliamentary inquiry; it is a question of fact.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, are we to understand the Speaker to decline to answer?

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say it is easy, especially after an all-night session, for gentlemen to wax eloquent——

Mr. BURLESON. There is no eloquence.

The SPEAKER. And grow suspicious——

Mr. BURLESON. There is no suspicion.

The SPEAKER. And at times even a Member of this House may be careless in the use of words in imputing to those who are not Members of this House, charged with the performance of official duty, bad faith and a want of performance of their duty. In the judgment of the Chair, confirmed by the experience of many years, a quorum was never obtained in the early morning hours until at least after daylight, and while men ought not perhaps to be held to strict accountability for what they say, even to themselves, yet the Chair has heard some very severe language, based upon suspicion, against an officer of this House who has no opportunity to reply. So much for that.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Speaker has the floor now.

Mr. BURLESON. I beg the Speaker's pardon; I thought he had concluded his statement.

The SPEAKER. Now, the Chair listened to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], also to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentlemen are familiar with the provision of the Constitution.

The Chair will read it again, notwithstanding it was read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania:

> A majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day.

That is one thing they can do.

> And may be authorized—

Who may be authorized? The smaller number may be authorized—> to compel the attendance of absent Members in such manner and under such penalities as each House may provide.

It does not say that the smaller number may authorize of itself. Now, then, it is a matter that has been talked about from time to time, the Chair apprehends, in both bodies, and the Chair reads now from Hinds's Digest (Vol. IV, section 2980, footnote):

> In the Senate it seems to have been held that under the Constitution there is no power to compel the attendance of absentees except at the first meeting of the Senate, and that for subsequent meetings the power must be given by a rule, as in the House. (See statement of Senator Fessenden on May 4, 1864, 1st sess. 38th Cong., Globe, p. 2089.)

Now, then, to say the least of it, the Chair, in the performance of his ministerial duty—the House having adopted a rule as the Constitution authorizes it to do—will hesitate long in the exercise of a ministerial duty before he will sign a warrant upon the request of the gentleman from Texas, a Member of the House, or upon the request of less than a quorum——

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, if the Speaker will permit an interruption there——

The SPEAKER. Oh, yes; unless the warrant conforms with the procedure that had been provided by the rule. Now, in the opinion of the Chair, having somewhat hastily examined the question, the warrant would be void if signed by the Speaker—the warrant to which the gentleman refers—and if it went into the hands of Mr. Sinnott, whoever he may be, it would be no protection to him, and that being the best opinion of the Chair, the Chair, at least for the present, declines to sign the warrant.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, of course the question came up for this reason: The House has been here in session without a quorum since 2.30 o'clock this morning. The Sergeant-at-Arms has arrested, I am informed, one gentleman and produced him at the bar of this House. Some four hours and a half have intervened——

The SPEAKER. Now, does the gentleman want that to go as his statement? Many gentlemen have come to the bar of the House and have been produced by the Sergeant-at-Arms, not handcuffed and dragged in, of course, in a manner distasteful to the Members.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Sergeant-at-Arms has produced 1 Member. I think there are probably 25 or 30 Members, or near that number, anyhow, that have voluntarily appeared before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair since he took the chair, a very short time ago, has seen several members brought in accompanied by the officers, and the Chair is informed that 48 Members have been brought in; and the Chair only interrupts the gentleman, knowing, as the Chair does know the gentleman from Alabama, that under all conditions he would not make the statement that he does about an officer of this House until he was thoroughly advised that he was correct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, "the gentleman from Alabama" would not do anything that he was not advised was correct, and I am advised that so far—although I was absent from the House some time last night, say a couple of hours—by Members around me, that until the last half hour the Sergeant-at-Arms himself produced one man at the bar of this House. Four or five men were produced a minute ago.

Now, we have had four hours and a half, or nearly five hours, since this order was made. We are entitled to a quorum of this House. There has been ample time for the Sergeant-at-Arms to produce a quorum here, and I think the membership of this House, even if less than a quorum, has a perfect right and an orderly right to inquire into the question, without reflecting on the Sergeant-at-Arms or anybody else, as to whether he has diligently performed the duty that has been prescribed for him to-day by the membership of this House. I do not think it is any reflection, and I would not reflect on any officer of this House unjustly, but I think it is a very proper inquiry as to whether the Sergeant-at-Arms has been diligently doing his duty in this matter.

The SPEAKER. One deputy reports to the Speaker that there are seven men whom he accompanied to the House, having gotten them out of their beds.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, may I be heard just one moment?

The SPEAKER. Oh, certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I simply desire to say, Mr. Speaker, if I understood the Chair's ruling on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]——

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not make a ruling. The Chair said as at present advised he did not feel that he was authorized or justified in signing additional warrants not issued under the rule of the House. That is all.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw very cheerfully and gladly the words I used inadvertently when I said "the Speaker's ruling," because I am well aware that nothing has transpired here within the last twenty-four hours which would justify me in suggesting the Speaker has made any ruling whatever. But I understood the Speaker to say that he had not signed the warrants——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman misunderstood. He signed the warrants as soon as they could be prepared.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I mean the last warrant—the one I am talking about. The Speaker has just said if he had signed this warrant it would have been void, and would have afforded Mr. Sinnott no protection.

Now, I merely want to say, in my humble judgment, if the Speaker had signed the warrant ordered by the Members, and if such warrant had been void as suggested by the Speaker, and Mr. Sinnott had gone forth in this city seeking to arrest and bring before the bar of this House Members who are absent, in reckless disregard of their oaths and duty, if he had no greater success than the Republican Sergeant-at-Arms and his deputies, he could not possibly have subjected himself to more than nominal liability on account of his action.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad if the Speaker would be so gracious as to hear me for a moment on this question of parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing to do but talk.

Mr. JAMES. If that be so, I am sure the Speaker will hear me. When the Speaker was not in the House, therefore not in the chair, a motion was put by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] as Speaker pro tempore, that Mr. Joe Sinnott be appointed as a special officer of the House to go forth for the purpose of arresting and bringing before the bar of the House certain absent Members, in order that their absence might not interfere with the transaction of public business. The Speaker pro tempore held that motion was out of order, and an appeal was taken from his decision. That appeal was put to the House, and the appeal was sustained by the House. After the appeal was sustained, and the Chair's holding upon the parliamentary status not sustained by the House, a motion was put to the House, directing the Chair, as Speaker of the House, to issue warrants for the purpose of having these gentlemen arrested by this special official.

Now, with all due respect to the Chair, I would like to inquire whether or not that action, taken in that form, is legal, and whether or not the Speaker, in view of that situation, would be justified in holding that he, as the presiding officer, with that record before him, would be performing his duty properly in refusing to sign the warrant for the arrest of those Members by the special officer selected by the House?

Furthermore, not only as a question of parliamentary law, but as a question even higher than parliamentary law, I assert as a lawyer upon this floor, without fear of successful contradiction, the legal status of that warrant issued by the Speaker, under these conditions, would protect the Sergeant-at-Arms in the performance of the mission the House directed him to perform. Any other position would hold that an officer who goes forth to perform a duty that is placed upon him by an authority seemingly regular is taking upon himself the hazard of its regularity. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment that is not only not the law of this House, but it is not the law of any court in any jurisdiction in the United States of America. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated his views in the matter, and it is not necessary to restate them.

Subsequently,

Mr. BURLESON. A parliamentary inquiry. How many more Members are required to make a quorum?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the roll call shows a quorum. [Applause.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to dispense with all further proceedings under the call of the House.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 62.

Mr. OLMSTED. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER (after counting). Twenty-six gentlemen have arisen—a sufficient number——

Mr. JAMES. The other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The other side is demanded. [After counting.] On this question the yeas are 26 and the nays are 90, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. JAMES. Tellers, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] will take their places as tellers.

The House again divided; and tellers reported ayes 30, noes 64.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. I was paired for the night. I notice that my pair voted——

The SPEAKER. The Chair's observation has been, and the Chair itself knows, that several gentlemen who were paired have passed between the tellers. On a yea-and-nay vote the pairs are regarded, but the observation of the Chair is that gentlemen do not respect pairs on a vote by tellers.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 24, nays 96, answered "present" 31, not voting 237, as follows:

Until 9 a. m., March 18:

Mr. DAWSON with Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire if the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NYE] is recorded?

The SPEAKER. He is not.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yesterday morning the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NYE] told me that he was going to leave the city, and asked me to pair with him for yesterday, which I did, with the express understanding that it was for yesterday. I should like to inquire if that pair still holds?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not answer the gentleman. The matter of pairs can not be passed upon by the Chair.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will suggest to the gentleman that this is the same legislative day for which the pair was made.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I paired for the calendar day, but if there is any question about it, I should like to have my name called and to vote "present."

The Clerk called the name of Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi, and he voted "present."

Mr. ADAMSON. Did the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I vote "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. This is a motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The noes have it, and the motion fails.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURLESON. What progress is being made toward securing a quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The record shows that a quorum is present.

Mr. BURLESON. I now demand the regular order.

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BURLESON. I raise the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that that point of order is dilatory.

Mr. CURRIER. Oh, but it must be perfectly evident to the Speaker that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BURLESON. The Speaker just having announced a quorum was present, how can the issue be raised whether a quorum is present or not?

Mr. CURRIER. Through the Speaker's own eyes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. We are now in the call of the House, and the House having refused to dispense with the call, the regular order would be a motion to adjourn, a motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call, or perhaps other motions. Does the gentleman desire to be heard further?

Mr. BURLESON. I desire a ruling on the part of the Speaker as to whether or not a quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is in doubt as to whether a quorum is actually present, although the record shows it.

Mr. BURLESON. I ask that the roll be called to ascertain whether there is a quorum present. I move that the roll be called in order to ascertain whether there is a quorum present.

Mr. CURRIER. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. The House is under a call now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman moves that the roll be called?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will ask for it.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. It has already been stated by the Chair that the motion of the gentleman from Texas is out of order; that we are now in a call of the House. The only proceeding that can be taken now is to dispense with the proceedings under the call of the House, or, in lieu of that, a motion to adjourn. It is perfectly manifest that one of those motions can be made, and it will determine upon a roll call upon either one the fact of whether there is a quorum physically present in this House.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not desire to make the motion to adjourn, but I desire to ascertain whether a quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is unable to state whether a quorum is actually present, although the record shows a quorum is present.

Mr. BURLESON. As I understand the Chair, he has just ruled that a quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The record shows that a quorum is present, but the Chair is in doubt as to whether a quorum is physically present.

Mr. CARLIN. Is not the Chair governed by its own record?

Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma. When did the record show that a quorum was present? How long has it been since the record showed that a quorum was present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A long time.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. As much as three hours?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not quite three hours, the Chair would say. How long has the gentleman been here?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I do not believe the Chair has a right to interrogate a Member who rises for information, and I decline to answer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is unable to say just how long it has been since the call was made.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I understood the Speaker to say that a quorum was present. If that is so, what are we doing here?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is in doubt as to whether a quorum is actually present.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Would not a roll call settle that? If a quorum is present, what are we sitting around here for? I would like the Speaker to answer that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is prepared to receive a motion from the gentleman from Alabama that the call of the House be suspended.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Does the Speaker decline to entertain a proposition to call the roll?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman make the motion to call the roll?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; oh, no. I just asked that question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama does not raise the question of no quorum?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I have not done that at all. I know the Chair would like to have me do that, but I have not done it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hopes that the gentleman from Alabama is not endeavoring to confuse the Chair.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I understand the Chair to say that the record discloses the presence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire the record read?

Mr. ADAMSON. I asked the Chair if the Chair stated that the record discloses the presence of a quorum, and I understood the Chair so to state.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will answer the gentleman. The record discloses that a quorum is present.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the Chair not believe its own record?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But many gentlemen have passed out of the Hall since, and it is a question whether a quorum is actually present.

Mr. ADAMSON. What right has the Chair to impeach its own record?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no desire to impeach the record, but is willing to receive a motion that the roll be called.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, having the greatest confidence, based upon actual knowledge from long service with the present distinguished occupant of the Speaker's chair on a committee, that he is well informed on this and other matters, and knowing that he is fair and that the country knows that he is fair, I do not think that the great intellect and knowledge of the present occupant of the Speaker's chair needs any further time on the point of order, and I am confident the House will believe it was as well decided as it can be by the ability and knowledge of the present occupant of the chair; therefore why not let the Chair rule on the present point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is waiting for a motion.

Mr. SIMS. Does the Chair need to wait for a motion to decide that point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not sure that a quorum is present.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Will the Chair state to the House whether the roll call has been completed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The roll call has not been completed.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Then, the Chair, from that statement, is not authorized to state whether the roll call discloses the presence of a quorum if the roll has not been completed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already answered several distinguished gentlemen who have made inquiry upon the same line, that the record shows a quorum to be present, but that the Chair is in doubt as to whether a quorum is present.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I understood the Chair to say the roll call had not been completed. Was I correct in my understanding?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Members are coming and Members are going——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I understand that. A Member has a right to vote any time he comes in, and the Chair is awaiting that in order to determine whether a quorum is present or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct; gentlemen are coming and going.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I understand, but I merely wanted to get the proposition straight before the House. The Chair, under the rules of the House, is waiting the appearance of Members under order of the House that a call of the House be had to determine whether or not a quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is awaiting the appearance of a quorum.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order. The record shows there is a quorum present. The regular order is a ruling on the point of order that has been made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas will understand that the call of the House is prevailing.

Mr. CURRIER. Is not the regular order to dispense with further proceedings under the call or to adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the regular order, or to bring in Members.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. As I understand, the record shows a quorum is present; therefore the House may proceed with the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has not disposed with the proceedings under the call, and therefore may not proceed until the proceedings under the call are dispensed with. The regular order is to get Members here so that a quorum may be determined.

Mr. SABATH. Well, what is being done, Mr. Speaker, to bring Members in? We have been here all night, and it is now 20 minutes to 10, most of us without dinner, without supper, without breakfast, without sleep, and without rest.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman understands that the present occupant of the chair has been in the chair but a short time, but his information is that proper steps are being taken to bring Members in, and that that work is proceeding in the regular way.

Mr. SABATH. In a slow way, I notice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As rapidly as it may proceed in the regular way.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call of the House be vacated.

Mr. CURRIER. Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia moves that further proceedings under which the call of the House was ordered be dispensed with.

Mr. CURRIER. Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire makes the point of order.

Mr. CURRIER. That there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. CURRIER raises the question of no quorum.

Mr. HARDWICK. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. Pending the call of the House, the point of no quorum ought not to be entered, under the rules, by the Chair. It is multiplying the proposition indefinitely.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks, upon the record showing the presence of a quorum, a motion to dispense with the proceedings may be entertained.

Mr. HARDWICK. On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the attention of the Chair to the fact that a later roll call than the call referred to disclosed the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is to continue to bring in Members, as the Chair understands it.

Mr. CURRIER. Or to move to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Or to move to adjourn, the alternative suggested to the gentleman from Texas a moment ago.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. As I have already inquired of the Chair, the House is proceeding under the order of the call of the House, and that has not yet been completed. Is that correct?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call of the House has not yet been completed.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. And until that is completed and the doors declared to be opened, and a quorum present, no other business is in order except a motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is substantially correct.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman will yield to me, I desire to state to my colleague [Mr. BARTLETT] that there is one other motion that is in order, a motion to vacate the proceeding under the call, and a record vote has been taken upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] a few moments ago was withdrawn.

Mr. HARDWICK. The last business done by this House was a record vote on that proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not aware of that, because the Chair's life on this occasion has been brief.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair kindly inform the House what progress the Sergeant-at-Arms is making in his effort to bring in absent Members?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not fully informed, but, judging from the Chair's experience at an early hour this morning, the Chair will say that the Sergeant-at-Arms is busy.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I have been requested by Members to ask the Speaker pro tempore to relate his experience so that we too may judge of the energy of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would be very glad to do that except that he was found this morning in the company of several Members on the Democratic side and would prefer that they should tell the story. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to know if the Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms, Mr. Sinnott, has made a report to the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Two Members have just been brought in. The Sergeant-at-Arms is at work.

Mr. MAYNARD. Who is he working? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Both sides.

Mr. CARLIN. I would like to inquire what progress we are making as to a quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that we are making progress.

Mr. SABATH. How many are we short, Mr. Speaker, of a quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The record divulges that a quorum is present, but the Chair is still unable to determine whether a quorum is present.

Mr. SABATH. If a quorum is present we can proceed to do business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has refused to recede from the call of the House. Until that is done we are proceeding in the usual way, with the call of the House.

Mr. GILL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the gentleman to move to dispense with further proceedings under the call?

Mr. GILL of Maryland. I withdraw that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman upon his motion.

Mr. BUTLER. He withdraws it.

Mr. PAYNE. He withdraws it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Maryland to withdraw his motion.

Mr. GILL of Maryland. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMS. A parliamentary inquiry. Has it not been the universal custom that a call of the House was ordered to ascertain the presence of a quorum, and that when the call had proceeded far enough to ascertain that a quorum was present the object and purpose of the call was then accomplished?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the understanding of the Chair, as a rule.

Mr. SIMS. The record of the roll call shows a quorum present now. Can the Chair, physically, with his eyes, look around over the Chamber and overrule the effect of the roll call?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. So far as the Chair is concerned, with his eye, physically, he can see that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. SIMS. And the Chair does not regard the evidence of the record as conclusive as to whether or not a quorum is present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not well believe the evidence of a record which is not attested by ocular demonstration.

Mr. SIMS. Does it take the presence of a quorum for the Chair to announce his ruling if it is ready to make it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would say that a quorum should be present.

Mr. SIMS. While a quorum was being obtained, of course the Chair has had time to give further meditation and study to the question during the last several hours.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pro tempore occupant of the chair is acting under the instruction of the House. The majority of the House appears to have refused to dispense with further proceedings under the call of the House; and, acting under the instructions of the majority of the House, the Chair insists that the regular order should proceed, which is the call of the House.

Mr. SIMS. What is the object of the call continuing to ascertain the presence of a quorum, when, that being ascertained by the call, its purpose is thoroughly and completely executed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Because the Chair is unable by ocular demonstration to determine whether there is a quorum present.

Mr. SIMS. What rule authorizes the Chair to bring his ocular demonstration in as higher evidence than the record of the call itself?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was simply accepting the expression of the gentleman from Tennessee, who raised the question of ocular demonstration himself.

Mr. SIMS. I am not criticising the Chair. I am simply asking for information, which I have not always been able to get from a temporary occupant of the Chair so fully as from the present occupant of the chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is quite sure that the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee would not wish to wean the Chair from executing what seems to be the will of the majority, which has decided that there shall be a call of the House.

Mr. SIMS. I am ready to give all praise to the gentleman who does not wish to be indifferent to the will of the House, but is willing to be governed by it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is endeavoring to ascertain whether the will of the majority has been observed, in order that a quorum may be here when business may be transacted, but thus far a quorum does not appear to be present.

Mr. SIMS. I understood the Chair to say that a quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But Members have been coming and going, the Chair will say to the gentleman from Tennessee; some of them from one side of the House and some from the other side; some going out and some coming in; and the Chair is unable to determine that a quorum is now present.

Mr. SIMS. As long as Members continue to do that the Chair will not consult the record to show a quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It still may be possible in time to get a quorum.

Mr. SIMS. If the presence of a quorum is to be determined by ocular observation, we may as well understand the parliamentary situation, and the time, therefore, is well spent in hearing from the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order. Gentlemen will understand the impropriety of singing on the floor, even though the House is not at this moment transacting any business. The House is not in recess.

CHORUS. "There'll be a hot time in the old town to-night."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was last night, not to-night. [Laughter.] The House will be in order.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the tap-tapping of the Chair's gavel interferes with the music. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The tapping of the gavel now is nothing to what it may be hereafter. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the Speaker of this House having willfully, deliberately, and contemptuously abdicated his functions, a state of anarchy reigns in the great legislative body of this country. We can not proceed with any sort of business. Why? Because the Speaker of the House deliberately refuses to perform his functions and give us power to transact the business that the Constitution requires that we shall perform. [Applause.] More than that, Mr. Speaker, the Sergeant-at-Arms sits there with a warrant issued by this House to go out, arrest, and bring in Members. He is contemptuously refusing to perform his duty. He is not warranted in his failure simply because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] may have privately advised him to pursue that course. The Speaker has no power, except from his chair, and unless he directs the Sergeant-at-Arms from the chair not to exercise his duties as Sergeant-at-Arms, then the Sergeant-at-Arms is bound by the warrant that he holds to arrest the absentees and bring them in here, and when he refused to do that, sir, he is bringing anarchy into this body. Whoever stops the wheels of Government to that extent is inflicting the country with anarchy. It is a shame that this House is stopped in the performance of its duty; is not allowed to perform its functions, because, forsooth, the Speaker finds that he is not able to dominate a majority. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Because he can not dominate a majority he will not permit this great deliberative body to proceed with the transaction of its business. It is your duty, sir, to perform your functions in order that this body may transact its business; in order that the Constitution may be enforced; in order that free government may survive. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COUDREY. How can the gentleman say that the Sergeant-at-Arms has not done his duty when he sees the numbers of Members on this floor who were routed out of their beds to come here?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The Sergeant-at-Arms has not done his duty. I was in my bed when that order was sent forth. I was within one block of this Capitol. I was not ready to resist arrest. Why did not the Sergeant-at-Arms come and get me and 20 or 30 others whom he could have gotten within one block of this House? I do not know why he did not do it, but I will tell you what I think was the reason. I think that the Speaker issued that warrant, and then went privately and said to the Sergeant-at-Arms, "Do not execute it; they will beat us if we get a quorum here." The failure of the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring a quorum in is nothing but anarchy. The Speaker deliberately blocks the House in the performance of its constitutional duties. Nothing can be done till he decides the point of order. We have been in continuous session nearly twenty-four hours, waiting for him to decide it. He withholds his decision till he can browbeat and whip in enough to give him a majority. Sir, he precipitates anarchy in this House.

How can you be surprised that the ranks of anarchy are being multiplied all over the land when the Speaker of the House will not be governed by law; when the coadjutors of the Speaker will deliberately set aside the law, set aside the rules of the House, set aside the Constitution, and violate the oath which they took to support the Constitution; what can you expect of the people in the way of patriotism?

Mr. Speaker, do your duty and put it up to us to do ours. Bring an end to this disgraceful scene. You who were chosen by the people to carry out the Constitution are deliberately bringing anarchy into the halls of legislation. That is what you are doing, Mr. Speaker, if you do not proceed as the Constitution requires you shall proceed. Decide the point of order as under your oath it is your duty to do. If you have a majority with you, vote us down. If you have a majority against you, as loyal American citizens, in obedience to your oaths of office, yield to the majority and let the people be supreme. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, it has seldom been my lot to hear a more unfounded harangue than that which has just taken place in this House. The gentleman says we have not been able to get a quorum here through the night just because the Sergeant-at-Arms was not able to find Members.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Because he willfully disobeyed his instructions.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I hope the wind from the cave will cease and allow somebody to talk. The truth in regard to the Sergeant-at-Arms is that the gentleman himself, in contempt of the House and in violation of the rules of the House, was over here, a single block away, with 20 or 30 of his confederates, and the Sergeant-at-Arms did not know where they were stopping or for some other reason failed to bring them here at the bar of the House.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman does not seem to know a point of order from a hole in the ground.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that when the gentleman says I was absent last night at a hotel with my confederates——

Mr. PAYNE. I did not say the gentleman was at a hotel.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I want to say that they were not my confederates, that they were the confederates of the Speaker of this House, who is not willing that legislation should proceed, and they were going out of here for that purpose. They are not my confederates, they were my opponents, and I make the point of order that the gentleman does not quote me correctly.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman seeks to correct my statement. Now, if they were not his confederates, it throws discredit on his tale, because under the situation last night I do not think anybody on this side of the House would associate with the gentleman from Missouri during the night, in contempt of the House.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, what is there before the House? I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York is not in order. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on his point of order?

Mr. SABATH. I do.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am speaking to one of the numerous points of order made by the gentleman from Missouri, I can not tell which one; I am mixed up. [Laughter.]

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman is mixed up I will withdraw the point of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Speaker, is the name of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] recorded on the roll of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. PAYNE. Then it looks as if he knew there was a call of the House and sneaked in and did not get recorded. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDWICK. The regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia demands the regular order.

Mr. PAYNE. I am speaking to one of the numerous points of order made by the gentleman from Missouri, and trying to answer it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair rules that this debate is not in order, that we are proceeding on a call of the House. A motion to dispense with the call of the House is in order.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the gentleman from Missouri be arraigned before the bar of the House and punished for contempt in not being present.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I am here present. I waive any warrant for my arrest and I appear before the bar of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will note the presence of the gentleman from Missouri under the rule.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. The RECORD discloses in a forceful way that I was present, and have been present, except two hours out of the twenty-four, which I took for sleep while this filibuster was going on—while the Speaker of the House was abdicating his functions to stop the wheels of legislation; while he has refused to perform the functions that he took an oath in this House that he would perform, when he said he would stand by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call of the House.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a motion to excuse the gentleman from Missouri, and wish to be heard on that motion. I claim the right to the floor.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard in opposition to that motion. I do not want the gentleman's motion to excuse me for anything.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In regard to the point raised by the gentleman from New York, the Chair will read from paragraph 2 of Rule XV:

> Members who voluntarily appear shall, unless the House otherwise directs, be immediately admitted to the Hall of the House, and they shall report their names to the Clerk to be entered upon the Journal as present.

This has been done.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I did not report my name, and I decline to do it now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to say that he would report.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. No, Mr. Speaker, I am not reporting at all. I am right here now and not making any report whatever.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair wishes to announce that the records show that the gentleman from Missouri did report.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Well, the records are not correct in that particular, and I am afraid in many others.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, a motion to vacate proceedings under the call takes precedence of everything else at this stage of the proceedings, and I insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. [Cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"] The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] is entitled to the floor, and the Chair will hear from the gentleman briefly on the point of order. The Chair will rule in the near future.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted by a filibustering demand from the Democratic side for a call of the House, I was dwelling upon the various methods that might have been utilized in selecting a Committee on Rules by the membership. If the majority party selected both the majority and the minority members, it might be entirely possible to select weak men representing the minority and thus do an injustice to the minority and the country. If, upon the other hand, the majority party in this House was somewhat divided and torn with dissensions, a very small minority of the majority party might, by uniting with the minority party, select the members for both parties. It seemed to me that the just method of selecting the Committee on Rules was, therefore, for the majority party to select its members in caucus and the minority party to select its members in caucus. Believing that, I personally offered a motion in the Republican caucus which so provided and which carried.

There has been some criticism of the membership of the Committee on Rules and the manner of their selection. I simply want to say that the Republican members of this committee were both chosen by the unanimous vote of the Republican caucus on Saturday night, and on Monday following, when the gentleman from Missouri, the leader of the Democratic side, offered his motion to elect a committee on the subject of rules from the floor of the House, he named both of those members, so that the two present Republican members of the Committee on Rules thus received the votes of every Republican, every insurgent, and every Democrat in this Chamber.

What have been the methods of this committee? The methods have been to ascertain what rules would carry in this House before presenting them. In place of the committee bringing in rules and imposing them upon the House, no rule has been presented until it was known that a majority of the House were in favor of that rule. It is said that the Committee on Rules has never been defeated, and it never has, because it has never presented a rule to the House until it knew that the majority was behind that rule.

A criticism has been made upon the tariff rule of last summer. I want to say that before that rule was prepared the Republican whip was directed to ascertain from every delegation with Republicans upon it how many things they demanded a separate vote upon; and when this had been aggregated, and it was found how many things enough men demanded a separate vote on to affect the result by their uniting with the Democrats, those things were put into the rule; and at the time this rule was brought in, if this House had voted down the previous question, as it had a perfect right to do, that rule could have been amended by adding to the things to be voted upon every article in the schedules from beginning to end; and the House itself, by voting first for the previous question and then for the rule, fixing the subjects upon which a separate vote was to be taken, specifically voted that it did not desire a separate vote upon any other articles; and if it had wanted such a vote, its plain duty was to vote down the previous question and add those articles to the resolution presented by the Committee on Rules.

There has been some talk about there being no way to amend these rules. There are several ways to amend these rules, without revolution. One of them is that any 50 Members of the majority party can call a caucus of that party, and that caucus can instruct the majority members of the Committee on Rules to report any amendment to the rules desired by a majority of the majority party. That is one way the rules can be amended.

They can be amended during the two years by any Member sending an amendment to the Committee on Rules in the ordinary course and if the Committee on Rules will report upon the proposed amendment. Not a resolution of even the general character of the one now pending before the House has been introduced by anybody and referred to the Committee on Rules during this Congress of the United States. No effort whatever in the legal way has been made to amend these rules along the lines suggested by the pending resolution.

I never, for one, have contended that the rules were perfect, and have always been ready to consider any concrete proposition for their betterment. I have voted for numerous changes in the rules, both in the last and in this Congress. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] complained yesterday that he had not been able to get his matters reported from the Committee on Rules. He had a most important resolution before the Committee on Rules, which I hold in my hand, which reads as follows:

Whereas a government parcels-post system has been in successful operation in several European countries; and

Whereas there is a strong demand by the granges and people of rural communities for the establishment of a properly guarded parcels-post system in the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be requested to inquire into its feasibility and desirability and report to the House within thirty days.

The gentleman, so far as I know, never spoke to any member of the Committee on Rules on this subject.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman give way?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would rather wait a moment. He wrote letters to the various members of the committee. I answered him that, for one, I did not believe in his parcels-post proposition, and I do not. Then, in a second letter, he assumed that I had intimated that I was in favor of smothering that resolution, and I replied to him that I was not in favor of smothering resolutions, but in favor of giving the House an opportunity to vote on them, and that I would take pleasure in voting to report his resolution adversely. But apparently the gentleman thinks he is not only entitled to a report from the committee and to have the Members vote according to their will and pleasure in making that report, but deprive them of their personal judgment upon the subject. He received a letter from the Speaker, in which he told him his resolution would be considered in the next meeting of the Committee on Rules, and that committee, having no fixed day to meet, has not met since.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman give way?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. FISH. That was six weeks ago, I believe.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, yes; that is correct.

Mr. FISH. And the committee has not had any meetings.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It has had no meeting since; none whatever.

Mr. FISH. Then, what chance had a man to have an opportunity here on his bill? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the gentleman had ever appeared and asked for a hearing, he would have had one long ago; but he apparently believes in long-distance requests and demands a report of the committee satisfactory to him, as well as for it to report.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman give way for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, yes.

Mr. FISH. If there was no meeting of your committee, how could I appear before your committee?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. You could have gone to gentlemen on that committee and asked to be heard.

Mr. FISH. I did ask for it several times.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. By letter. Now, the gentleman also complained that he had an important bill pending before the Committee on Ways and Means, a bill to put beef on the free list, and that he could not get a report from that committee.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman makes a mistake in regard to that. I never said I had any bill before that committee.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is not that your statement made on yesterday?

Mr. FISH. No.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. What was the gentleman's statement?

Mr. FISH. That Mr. FOELKER had a bill pending before that committee.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, yes. I misunderstood the gentleman on yesterday and cheerfully apologize to him. I wanted to say that last summer we passed a tariff law on beef and everything else, and I for one am opposed to the removal of the tariff on beef and am glad that that committee buried the bill, and I would help bury it here if it ever came up. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Of course if it is tyranny not to report in accordance with the will and pleasure of the gentleman from New York, then there has been tyranny in the administration of the rule. When did the gentleman discover the iniquity of these rules? Last March he voted for the previous question and he voted for the rules of the last Congress without a change of the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

When the gentleman from Missouri offered his resolution to appoint a committee to revise the rules, the gentleman voted for the Fitzgerald substitute, and the roll call shows it, and he also voted for the rules of the House as they now are. If he has learned so much in one brief year, perhaps if we will wait another year he may learn even more.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not care to much longer delay the House. We have been doing some strange things the last few days. We decided that this census bill was privileged under the Constitution. We then decided that a question of constitutional privilege is not entitled to come up on calendar Wednesday. I was not much disappointed, because, as I thought, the next day we said the Constitution was still in force on the other six days in the week. But my friend, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], called to my attention that we were not so generous as that with the Constitution, and that we only decided that the Constitution was in force on St. Patrick's Day—only one day in the year instead of six days in the week.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am not a pessimist. I am hopeful, and I am glad the Constitution is in force a little part of the time, even if only on St. Patrick's Day; and cheered with the knowledge that the Constitution, which is here sought to be used as an instrument for revolution in the House, is in force a part of the time, I will be at least hopeful enough to refrain from employing anyone to "sing in purchased ditties how it died."

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I have been detained from the House for the past four or five days on account of illness, and I am here this morning against the advice of my physician.

I am here now only to state some views I have on the pending question. I entered the House about seven years ago as a new Member. One of the first speeches to which I listened was an arraignment of the rules of the House. I got the idea from that speech that a new Member, or, in fact, any Member of the House, stood as little show of accomplishing anything in this House under the rules as a member of the Apache tribe of Indians affecting legislation in this body. I confess that when I entered here I knew about as little of the rules of the House as I knew of the rules of the Choctaw council. I was not alone in that dilemma. There were many other Members who knew as little of the rules as I did. However, I procured a copy and studied them. I saw what Jefferson had said about parliamentary procedure. I studied the precedents that had been made in this House from its organization. I remained upon the floor and studied the application of these rules to the business in hand from day to day. When I did not understand what was going on I did not hesitate to ask some one who knew. I began to see into the rules. This gave me a little courage, and I undertook to represent my constituents in the way in which I had hoped to do when I received a certificate from them as a Representative to this body.

Since that time I have introduced 425 bills in the House of Representatives. Serving upon several committees, I have made reports on 109 bills. Working before committees to which my bills had been referred, I have secured reports on 59 bills. Of the 328 bills introduced, I have secured the passage of 68. Of the 109 bills upon which I made favorable reports from the committees of which I have been a member, every one, except one, is now a law, and that was vetoed by the President. During all this time, it is only fair to say, I served upon two committees that had a calendar day. Every bill reported from those committees had a calendar day and their call on the calendar. Some of them passed this House after heated debate upon this floor.

In addition to this, I have addressed the House in order 149 times, and in all this time I have not gone to the Speaker but once to ask to call up a matter in which I was interested. I was anxious to have a resolution passed by the House without being referred to a committee. It was a resolution calling for an investigation of the organization and methods of the Standard Oil Company. I got the Speaker's consent, for the asking, to offer the resolution and ask for its immediate consideration by the House.

I offered the resolution in the light of the decision in the Northern Securities case, dissolving a great trust with its original constituent companies. The result of the investigation under that resolution is now before the Supreme Court of the United States for its decision. In this, as in other matters, I determined what I deemed to be my duty, then found how to do it.

An article that appeared in the Republican-Record, published at Erie, Neosho County, Kans., makes some mention of this and other matters that I shall insert at this point in my remarks in the RECORD. I do this because of the oft-repeated charge that it is impossible for a Member to accomplish anything for his constituents or for his country under the rules of the House.

"The tree that bears the best apples has the most clubs under it." When the people stop to think of what PHIL CAMPBELL has done for the people of his district and the country during the short time he has been in Congress, it is not surprising that a few small-bore Democratic politicians should throw their impotent missiles at him. It is the nature of some small souls to find fault with those who achieve a notable success. Sometimes they do it for others.

We have taken the time to go through the record to find what Congressman CAMPBELL has done to give him the distinction that invited the attack of puny Democratic editors and politicians.

The first session he was in Congress he attracted the attention of the whole country because of his great speech on the tariff question. Senator DOLLIVER said it was one of the really great speeches on that question. The American Protective League has circulated over 4,000,000 copies of it.

AGAINST THE STANDARD OIL.

The second session he was in Congress he became famous throughout the whole country for his timely act in getting a resolution through the House of Representatives to investigate the organization and business methods of the Standard Oil Company. When the Standard Oil fight was hot at Topeka, CAMPBELL startled the big oil monopoly and the whole country by getting the Government of the United States on the trail of the greatest monopoly in the world. The wires flashed the news of what he had done to the world and the world took notice.

STANDARD OIL THREATS.

While he was yet receiving the congratulations of his friends on the floor, he was told he had made an enemy that would some day put him out of public life, and that it would be done so artfully that he would not know who did it. He was not afraid. He was working for a square deal for everybody, little and big, and then, as now, trusted in the people.

Thousands of letters and telegrams were sent to him from all over the country thanking him for his great service to the people. Three state legislatures adopted and sent him resolutions of appreciation. Independent oil industries in all the oil States resolved and sent him thanks. Newspapers and magazines wrote about him. He went on with his work.

The Commissioner of Corporations, Garfield, was slow with the work of investigation. CAMPBELL urged him to push the work. His resolution was adopted in the House on February 15, 1905. A year passed and Garfield had not yet made a report.

THAT $29,000,000 FINE.

CAMPBELL took another tack. On February 19, 1906, he introduced a second resolution. This time he asked that the Interstate Commerce Commission investigate the relation of the Standard Oil Company to the railroads of the country. He hit the mark. This resolution was adopted. The Interstate Commission went to work and soon found the facts upon which, together with what the Commissioner of Corporations had done, was based the suit before Judge Landis that resulted in the $29,000,000 fine.

On April 3, 1906, he introduced a bill prohibiting anyone doing an interstate business in any commodity from selling that commodity in one place at a lower price than was charged at another after equalizing the cost of freight between the two places.

PIONEER WORK FOR THE PEOPLE.

When the rate bill was before the House, he offered as the first amendment to it an amendment requiring common carriers to furnish all the facilities for freight transportation to all shippers at equal rates. He offered the first amendment to the rate bill making express companies and express cars common carriers. He introduced the first bill requiring notice before injunctions are issued. President Roosevelt has since recommended the same thing in his message to Congress.

On May 8, 1906, he introduced a resolution inquiring into the real causes of so many fatal railway accidents, and got the Interstate Commerce Commission at work on the subject in a fundamental way.

He had a bill before the House prohibiting gambling in the price of farm products and of stocks and bonds. It is a difficult undertaking, but CAMPBELL got a favorable report on his bill from the committee just before Congress adjourned. If he can stop stocks and grain gambling, it will be of itself enough to make his fame secure. A business man in Philadelphia wrote him about the matter as follows:

A LETTER OF COMMENDATION.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., May 21, 1908.

I note in this morning's Philadelphia papers that you contemplate introducing a bill to regulate gambling and speculating in Wall street. In view of the immense amount of what is done in this line, I very much doubt whether you will ever be successful, but I want to congratulate you, however, as you are the first man that I have heard of speaking along the lines that from a business point of view are absolutely correct. If this country would pass a law forbidding the selling of stocks that a man did not own, we would never have any more panics, excepting one that would be caused by the absolute demoralization of business, and stocks and bonds would be sold according to their actual value, based on interest paid and earning capacity. All the unsettling of business is caused by either the short or long selling of stocks, and I for one sincerely hope that you may succeed.

TO CURB TRUSTS.

He prepared and introduced a bill on April 6, of this year, suspending the patent and copyright laws of the United States where any patent or copyright or any article or product protected by patent or copyright is owned by a trust or monopoly in restraint of trade in violation of law.

These are a few things Congressman CAMPBELL has done and is doing that seek to promote the welfare of all the people. We have mentioned these acts only for the purpose of showing that he has the instinct and initiative of a constructive statesman and that he is taking hold of the new and difficult problems of his day and doing it vigorously and fearlessly.

"BULLY, CAMPBELL, BULLY"—THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

After he had done something that especially pleased the President, Roosevelt took him by the hand and said, "Bully, CAMPBELL, bully;" and so say the people.

Thousands of his supporters, and they are not all Republicans, have commended him and thanked him for his work. People from every section of the Union have commended and congratulated him. Here is what a few have said—we have a pile of letters, telegrams, and resolutions before us:

[From Humboldt, Kans.]

Be it further resolved, That we record our appreciation of Mr. CAMPBELL'S action, and that a copy of these resolutions be sent to him, with the language of the President, "Bully for CAMPBELL."

[Wheeling, W. Va.]

The inclosed resolutions are sent by this association with our thanks to you for what you have done for independent oil interests in the country.

[Los Angeles, Cal.]

[Chicago, Ill.]

Everybody is pleased with your prompt action in behalf of the oil belt.

[Chicago, Ill.]

I am proud of what you are doing.

[New Orleans, La.]

You are giving the greatest monopoly the fight of its life.

[Cherryvale, Kans.]

A Democrat said to me to-day: "I want a chance to vote for a man who is brave enough and good enough to undertake the work that CAMPBELL is doing." I congratulate you.

I ask the right to add my congratulations for the work you are doing for the country.

[Philadelphia, Pa.]

I congratulate you for the work you are doing for Kansas and for the entire United States.

[New York City.]

You have made a great move for the square deal.

[Boston, Mass.]

I thank you for your act of kindness to the people of the whole country.

This splendid record is unassailed by the cowardly insinuations made in connection with H. H. Tucker's employment of D. W. Mulvane to prevent the issuance of a fraud order by the Post-Office Department. The insinuations don't fool anybody. CAMPBELL is for the people, and the people are for CAMPBELL for Congress.

I want to assure you, however, that I have not always been able to do everything that I wanted to do in this House. I have found almost 400 other gentlemen here, some of them agreeing with me and some of them disagreeing with me. I have not been able, therefore, to get everything that I have wanted. It is probably a good thing for the country that I have not. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And it is just as good a thing to the country that the gentlemen who lead the applause have not been able to do everything that they have wanted to do. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is suggested by some one near me that it is a far better thing.

Mr. Speaker, a year or more ago, indeed a year ago on last December, realizing, as I did, the value of a calendar day, I, with other Members of this House, met almost nightly for some weeks endeavoring to perfect a rule providing for a calendar day. Such a rule was finally agreed upon, after some six weeks of deliberation. After that rule had been agreed upon, I went about the other work of this House and paid no further attention to additional amendments to the rules. I was sincere in advocating a calendar day, and with others introduced a resolution in this House providing for it. It was regularly referred to the Committee on Rules. Doing with it as I had done with other measures I had introduced in this House, with my colleague, who introduced the resolution with me, I asked the Committee on Rules for a hearing. A date was fixed. We had the hearing.

The rule was reported and brought into this House for consideration. Very much to my surprise many of the gentlemen who had been insistent upon a calendar day, a most important change in the rules, who insisted upon relieving the Members of this House from the necessity of abasing themselves, as they said, at the door of the Speaker; very much, I say to my surprise, many of these gentlemen voted against the rule providing for a calendar day that gives Members of this House an opportunity to call up their business on the calendar without consulting the Speaker, or anyone else except the committees to which the bills are referred. Under these rules, so amended, this Congress has a record for transacting business that is legislation. No other Congress has considered and passed as many bills as this Congress up to this day. Twenty-three thousand one hundred and eighty-three have been introduced, and 3,016 pension bills have already been reported on and passed. Seven hundred and sixty-six other bills have been reported from committees. Of these 766 bill, 150 went to the Union Calendar and 95 have already passed the House; 138 to the House Calendar and 100 have passed the House; 321 went to the Private Calendar and 201 have passed the House, and we are far on with the great appropriation bills.

Mr. Speaker, in view of all this I am unable to see the necessity for interrupting the work of this busy Congress at this busy time only for the purpose of inaugurating a backward revolution in the House and its procedure.

The Committee on Rules may not always do what I want done, may not always do what you want done; but, as suggested a moment ago by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], when that committee brings a rule into this House it has first tested the membership of this House to find out what they want. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I would rather trust the old method of appointing the Committee on Rules than the new method now proposed. The old method has resulted in the appointment of committees that have done the will of a majority of the House. Within the last eight years I have seen that committee bring in rules here for the enactment into law of administration measures that will go down into history as the most advanced and progressive legislation ever enacted in a like period by this or any other legislative body. [Applause.]

I like practical things. I would rather have an acre in the District of Columbia than a whole principality in Utopia, paraphrasing the words of another. There may be something altruistic, utopian, idealistic, dreamlike, and the method proposed of selecting the Committee on Rules. But I can see in it dangers to the very purpose of the gentlemen who are advocating it. We have no continual oligarchy in this House. The present Speaker of the House has occupied the chair a longer consecutive period than any other man who has occupied that position. He may come back in the next Congress; I do not know; his constituents in Illinois will decide that. He may die; I do not know; I hope not.

If he comes, he may not be a candidate for Speaker. He may be; there may be other candidates. Some one else may be elected. If some one else is elected we may have a new Committee on Rules, and the new Speaker will be the chairman of that committee; and we will all have a new deal all around. I would like to know how you would get a change from your committee of fifteen. Once organized, that committee becomes a perpetual institution of this House, to control its business. The old members of that committee will exercise an influence on the selection of the new members, and that body will be a continuous body, as it is at the other end of the Capitol. Gentlemen of insurgent proclivities at the other end of the Capitol are smarting under the procedure there of appointing committees by the Committee on Committees. They would gladly get rid of that method of selecting committees. We have been progressing, leading them in public sentiment, leading them in progressive measures under our rules and under our Committee on Rules. I submit to the gentlemen of this House that we can continue to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I have taxed far beyond wisdom my physical endurance. I am not sure that I ought not to have taken the advice of my physician and remained in my room; but I have felt keenly the unwisdom of the resolution that has for its object the appointment of so large a Committee on Rules, and in the manner proposed. I see more danger than safety in it to the speedy transaction of business in the House. It is easier to get action, quick action, from a committee of five than from a committee of fifteen, however appointed.

I sincerely hope that the resolution will not be agreed to. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the question under consideration is one of the most important questions that has come up for the determination of the House of Representatives during my period of membership in it. It involves, primarily, a question of order of procedure. It involves, in the next place, a question of merit upon the resolution offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I have definite ideas and convictions upon both these questions, and, under the liberal rule of debate that has prevailed for more than twenty-four hours, I desire to avail myself, in all frankness, of the opportunity of apprising this House of Representatives of my convictions upon these questions for whatever they may be worth to this deliberative body.

In the first place, it is perfectly clear that, as an original proposition under the rules, the resolution offered by the gentleman from Nebraska is not privileged and is not specially in order. However, it is as much in order as the Crumpacker resolution, on which the House yesterday reversed its vote of the day before and held it in order upon the plea of a high constitutional privilege.

The resolution of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] to which I refer had simply a remote reference to the taking of the census.

It was claimed upon calendar Wednesday that that resolution was in order because it was proceeding under a constitutional authority, the authority of the Constitution being simply that Congress has power to legislate to provide for the taking of the census, or, to be more accurate, the provision of the Constitution that a census shall be taken every ten years under such law as shall be provided.

No one would contend that the law we have already passed is not adequate to the taking of that census. No one would contend that if this particular resolution, in amendment of that law, should never pass, the Constitution would be in any sense impeded in the enforcement of the provisions that the census shall be taken every ten years, and that it shall be taken during this decennial period of 1910. Upon calendar Wednesday this House very properly, within the reason of the rules of procedure, in my judgment, held that it was not a matter of constitutional privilege. Upon the following day certain Members upon both sides, for reasons best known to themselves, reversed their positions, and consideration of it proceeded; and we have here before the House the ridiculous and anomalous condition that a constitutionally privileged resolution is not in order and can not be made in order upon calendar Wednesday, but may be made in order upon Thursday, the day following.

Why, Mr. Speaker, this House is a House of constitutionally limited powers. We have absolutely no authority to do anything whatever in a legislative way unless that authority is given us specifically or inferentially in the Constitution of the United States. There is not a single bill or resolution that we can bring up for passage in this body and make it in order to proceed at all unless there is some constitutional authority for it. This is a Government of limited constitutional powers, and every bill that can be brought in here can maintain itself upon the theory of a high constitutional privilege if all that is necessary to be said is that it is authorized by the Constitution. So my judgment upon the point of order was that the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana, which was very properly held to be out of order upon the day before, was also out of order yesterday. We were then confronted with another resolution equally as privileged if the constitutional authority for it is the proper basis, equally as much in order as the other, and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] who proposed it, while frankly conceding that he does not agree to the position taken, certainly has good precedent for the position that his resolution is as much in order as the action of the House taken upon the former resolution immediately preceding. If the Crumpacker resolution was privileged, the Norris resolution is privileged also.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are confronted with a question that has merits beyond the technical question of the order of procedure. We are proceeding from time to time under a body of most excellent rules. They are rules that represent the accumulated legislative experience of generations, during which the power of the House has swept from one political party to another, generations during which old parties have gone down and new parties have arisen, and in the main they are an excellent body of rules.

It would be queer, indeed, if some of this large mass of accumulation would not be found in practical operation to work contrary to the will of the majority, contrary to the will of the people concerning legislation. It would be strange, indeed, if it was not found necessary as time progresses to amend the rules. It is a significant and a peculiar thing that there is absolutely no provision made in these rules for their own amendment. I have been in this House some nine years. One of my most vivid experiences of the first days of my membership in this House was when we met in Republican caucus and I heard a most excellent and patriotic speech from one of the best public speakers who has been a Member of this House during my term, Col. Peter Hepburn, from Iowa. I heard the same speech at the beginning of every other term of Congress.

But, nevertheless, I was convinced then, and I am convinced now, that there was considerable basis for the position taken by Colonel Hepburn that during the evolution of these rules, almost unconsciously, more and more power has become concentrated in the Speaker and in his immediate advisers.

There has been some danger in this legislative body which, under the Constitution, under its splendid history, is regarded as the people's representative body—there has been some danger, indeed, and is danger now, that in the evolution of these rules the power has become more and more concentrated, contrary to the spirit of this people's broad representative body. It is a matter of some interest to know that our rules under which we are operating do not provide in terms that the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall be the chairman of the Committee on Rules. There is no provision in the rules that he shall be a member of the Rules Committee at all.

I ascertained from inquiry that the precedent by which the Speaker became a member of the Committee on Rules originated in 1858 from the circumstance that the then Speaker Orr, a Democratic Speaker from South Carolina, was a man learned in parliamentary law, and it was thought a proper thing that he should be added to the committee.

The precedent once being established, every subsequent Speaker has been made a member of the Committee on Rules. I am not able to say whether the first Speaker who became a member of the committee became afterwards chairman, but certainly for many years by custom, consistent entirely with the proposition I have made, that once you start the accumulation of power and it grows like a snowball as it proceeds unconsciously, it came to be accepted as a matter of course that the Speaker would be the chairman and dominating member of the Committee on Rules. Under a further provision of our rules the Speaker appoints all the committees. The Committee on Rules becomes by far the most important committee in this House, from the standpoint of the selection of what legislation out of the many bills that are up for consideration shall be considered; because out of 30,000 bills comparatively few can be taken up and deliberately passed. The Committee on Rules is the only one provided by our rules that can perform the task of sifting out and choosing between these bills, having practically the power in the first instance to propose to the House of Representatives what bills shall be selected for immediate passage. I say from that consideration and others this is the most important committee of the House.

There has been a growing sentiment, somewhat artificially cultivated and created, I am bound to say, and still a growing sentiment, that too much power in this regard to be consistent with the purpose, the genius, and the basis upon which this House of Representatives is organized under the Constitution has, by the evolution of increased power, now become concentrated in the Committee on Rules. From the circumstances that the Speaker has the appointment of all the committees, has the naming of that committee, and furthermore is the chairman of that committee, the conviction has been growing and growing without regard to the personality of the Speaker or the personnel of the Rules Committee that these rules ought to be popularized.

The Republican party one year ago listened to that demand and introduced on the 1st day of March, through the Committee on Rules, a resolution amending the rules and providing for calendar Wednesday. That same resolution, with some modifications, became a part also of what is known as the Fitzgerald amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. As a matter of fact, the only way in which this calendar Wednesday was affected by the Fitzgerald resolution was to put in a provision that it should not be displaced except by a two-thirds vote of the House. Is not that true?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The original resolution, as passed and reported from the Committee on Rules and adopted by the House, provided in practically the same language as this present resolution, excepting it required only a majority vote to dispense with calendar Wednesday; and under the Fitzgerald resolution, passed on the 15th of March, two weeks later, that was amended, providing for a two-thirds vote being necessary. But that is a good illustration of the only way known under the rules of amending the rules. To be regular, the amendment must originate in a resolution, which will be referred to the Committee on Rules, or originate primarily in that committee. In this instance there was considerable demand for the restoring of power to the individual Member, so that he would be in a position, periodically at least, to force consideration for his measures.

That was an important amendment to the rules. It was in the direction of further popularizing this body in its legislative capacity. Another amendment incorporated in the Fitzgerald resolution gives us a Unanimous Consent Calendar. This was in the same direction. I believed in those propositions at the time. I believe in them now. I voted for each of those amendments, which from some absurdity of position some of our insurgent friends did not vote for.

Now, in my opinion, this present question being up, it can not be dodged or avoided by the House of Representatives. It comes up irregularly, it is true. There is no provision in the rules authorizing the pendancy of this resolution at this time, and still it is a practical question. The House of Representatives has time and again, as the Speaker very properly said yesterday, arbitrarily suspended its rules upon occasion and done things in that way that it could not do under the rules. I desire, therefore, to be entirely frank with the Republican membership of this House. There is no question of higher privilege that can possibly be considered in a representative body than the question of amending the rules that shall govern that body in its deliberations. An amendment offered to the rules of procedure is certainly upon as high a plane of privilege inherently and independently of the constitutional provision as any other resolution that could come before this body for consideration. I personally hope that as Republicans we may meet this situation now, that we may introduce a resolution from the Committee on Rules meeting this situation, and giving us as Republicans an opportunity to vote upon it, and I commend to the consideration of the Rules Committee, if my suggestion meets with favor, a resolution which I now propose:

The Committee on Rules shall consist of 10 members, 6 of whom shall be members of the majority party, and 4 of whom shall be members of the minority party, all of whom shall be elected by the House by a majority vote. The Committee on Rules shall select its own chairman. All rules or parts thereof inconsistent with this resolution are hereby repealed.

It is within the power of the Republican Committee on Rules, controlled in the majority by the majority membership in this House, to present this solution or some similar solution to the proper and regular consideration of this body. If it should, then, in my candid judgment, Mr. Speaker, we can settle this question and go before the country, having met responsibility in a manly, proper way, and we can acquit ourselves of all responsibility, honorably, justly, and in a straightforward manner before our constituents. If, on the other hand, we force our insurgent brethren, nine-tenths of whom, in my opinion, at least, are as much at heart Republicans as you or I, to an alliance with Democracy, whatever may be their tendencies—no reflection upon the opposition personally, because our Democratic opposition is as fine a body of representative Americans as ever graced any portion of this Chamber—we will cause a serious breach in our ranks and jeopardize the important legislation that this Congress should pass.

This can be avoided if the committee commissioned to introduce measures modifying the rules shall act and do it properly.

I want to go further and say, first, the resolution in the form brought in by the gentleman from Nebraska, in my mind, is not a fortunate solution of this question. I certainly shall seek to amend it in its present form. The districting of the States into groups, each district of which must necessarily include some Democrats and some Republicans, would be artificial, would be clumsy, and would not work out satisfactorily. I think the majority of this House could select its members of this committee in caucus and then come here and by a majority vote elect the members of this committee. I shall therefore oppose the details of the special provisions of the Norris resolution, and I should, if we should reach that stage, offer an amendment something in the line which I have suggested. I do, however, favor the general purpose of this resolution. A committee of ten would preserve the same proportion to four Democrats that we now possess. It would give to the Republicans precisely the same proportion that we now have in the Committee on Rules.

The Democrats, so far as I am concerned, could very properly select their members on this committee, and we can select ours. We can get together as Republicans, we can choose from our Members those men to represent this part of the body upon that committee, and we can proceed with the orderly business of the House. I want to go one step further and say, that in the face of the procedure we have had, in the face of the position that the House took upon yesterday as to the privilege of the Crumpacker resolution, while I do not believe it is a correct precedent as an original proposition, if forced to action on that question by an appeal from the Chair, if the Chair should decide adversely, I will follow the precedent of the House and consider this a question of high privilege. The question of what our rules shall be is certainly of as high privilege as the other. And then I will proceed as best I can to discharge the duty of one Member in determining how this Committee on Rules shall be reorganized. And in saying that, Mr. Speaker, I voice simply my own convictions upon this important question. I make no criticism upon the present Speaker of the House.

I want to say that after nine years of service in this body I have never found it difficult, certainly not impossible, under the rules as administered by Speaker Henderson or by his successor, Speaker CANNON, to receive recognition for the consideration of any measure I might be championing that was of sufficient importance to be entitled to consideration here.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman how much a majority of the Republican caucus would be required to hold certain insurgents if it was not their opinion?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I can not answer for the insurgent Republicans. I give credit to the high personal purposes of Members of this body upon all sides. I have no characterization to offer of any man who may disagree with me, whether he may be a member of my party or a member of the opposition party, but I have this confidence in the Republican membership of this body that on any fair proposition that comes in good faith to remodel the Committee on Rules there will be no difficulty in getting the Republican Members in the caucus to select the personnel of that committee to be the Republican members of that body.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Suppose the gentleman had voted as I did on calendar Wednesday to overrule the decision of the Chair, and voted on yesterday when the same question came up, would he to-day follow the precedent set here yesterday if the Speaker should decide this motion not in order?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If the gentleman from Indiana has correctly stated his position——

Several MEMBERS. The gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. From Ohio; they are both creditable States—if the gentleman from Ohio has stated correctly his position and his vote upon this question on calendar Wednesday and yesterday, he and I voted precisely the same. I voted to overrule the decision of the Speaker upon Wednesday, because I believed that the decision was wrong and that the motion was not privileged under the Constitution or under our rules.

I voted the same when the matter was up again yesterday. Now, then, a resolution, which is as much privileged as the other, is up, or may be up, for consideration. The House immediately in following the Speaker has approved all the precedents upon that subject.

I consider this subject of the amendment of the rules as vastly upon a higher plane of privilege and right inherently in a legislative body than a question of the color of the hair or of the complexion or of previous nationality in enumerating the census. Therefore we want to be clear. I will hold the House to its precedent upon a question of minor importance, and apply it to one which I consider of much graver magnitude, the reconstruction of the most important committee having direction of the proceedings in the House.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman in the statement he last made seems to have offered to us some hope that we may have a vote upon this question. I would like to know how long he thinks it will take the Speaker, after he has already considered this question now for twenty-three hours, to make up his mind about how he will rule upon this question?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If anything that I have said has given to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] any basis of a beautiful hope, I am delighted. I can not pretend to guess as to how soon it will be possible that we may have a ruling upon the subject. I will say this, though: There has been very liberal opportunity for debate upon this proposition on both sides. It has been debated by Members of the House on both sides, not only upon this question of order, but generally as to the merits. It has been an irregular proceeding, but to my mind a very appropriate proceeding.

If we are going to have a more important question up in this session than this one, I do not anticipate it, and for one I should like an opportunity to be given to Members on either side of the House to express their views before we have a decision, if the Chair desires our views—certainly before we have a vote upon it ourselves, if that contingency arises.

Mr. JAMES. I would like to ask the gentleman if he believes that the Speaker is really undertaking to obtain what the parliamentary law is upon this question, and that this time that has been taken—twenty-three hours—has been for the purpose of ascertaining what his judgment ought to be? In reality, is it not for filibustering until he can get on this floor sufficient of his followers to overrule any appeal that may be taken from the decision?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It is not for me to say what is in the mind of the Speaker. I ought to say this to the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky: I have now served under two Speakers in this House. I remember an instance in the House in which John Sharp Williams, the leader of the minority, made a most suitable address, in which he complimented the universal fairness of the Speaker.

I think that under the popular criticism that has grown up against the Speaker, some of it perhaps caused by newspaper and magazine manipulation and advertisements, public sentiment may have changed toward the Speaker. I do not believe it has changed very much the personal views of the Members on either side of this Chamber. I believe this further, that certainly the minority here will have as fair and has had as fair treatment from the Speaker in the consideration of this great question as, if the conditions were reversed, we could hope to have from a Democratic Speaker under the same circumstances.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. I have heard that the gentleman from South Dakota is a great mathematician as well as an eminent statesman.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. You pay me a great but unwarranted compliment.

Mr. STANLEY. And I wish to propound to him a problem, mathematical to a certain degree in its nature. It has been charged by my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. TAWNEY], and by other distinguished statesmen upon that side of the House, that this motion made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was transparently insincere upon its——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to correct him there?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Have you ever heard the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this House make a statement to that effect, or that statement, in fact?

Mr. STANLEY. I so understood.

Mr. TAWNEY. You so misunderstood me, then, because I never thought of making the statement.

Mr. STANLEY. I humbly and sincerely beg the pardon of my friend—and I hope I may address him as my friend—the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I understood the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to say, and in the multitude of addresses I may have been mistaken, that this was clearly not a privileged question.

Mr. TAWNEY. For the information of the gentleman from Kentucky, I will state that I have not discussed the question at all.

Mr. STANLEY. Then I humbly admit my mistake, and I humbly beg pardon.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. What is the problem in mathematics that is troubling the gentleman?

Mr. STANLEY. I sincerely hope that I will receive the pardon that I sincerely crave. But about the mathematical proposition. It has been charged——

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. What is the problem?

Mr. STANLEY. I will come to the arithmetic in a second. It has been charged by more than one of the stalwart leaders on that side of the Chamber—by the gentleman from Ohio, I know beyond question of doubt—and he has asked, and in the asking is presumed an answer, if the gentleman from Missouri or if the gentleman from Alabama would seriously claim that this was a question of privilege under the Constitution, I might——

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further, unless the gentleman has a question. Cut out the frills.

Mr. STANLEY. After charging that it is transparently a subterfuge, if it takes the Speaker twenty-three hours to decide whether or not a question is privileged that is transparently and absolutely not privileged, how long, under the grace of God and the cycle of the centuries, would it take him to decide a question that does involve a question of parliamentary law? [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman's problem is mathematical, but he has not stated sufficient elements to reach a correct conclusion. I suggest that he figure it out on paper with a lead pencil, and after I get through I will give him any assistance in my power in seeing that the figures are properly checked.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have but one word more to say, and that is to my associates. Upon yesterday we were told by various Members, speaking from this side, that the Republicanism of those who could not agree with the leaders upon this question of the advisability of amending this rule is to be questioned. They are to be rallied by the cry of party loyalty. There is no possible question of party loyalty involved in this proposition. It is not proposed to limit in any degree the power of the Committee on Rules as now prescribed by the rules. The proposition is simply to determine how the committee shall be selected. To leave its selection, as far as practicable, to the popular choice of the membership of this House alone; to have it stand as it now is in its practical workings; and without any criticism upon anybody. The committee is now selected by the Speaker and is practically the advisory council of the Speaker, rather than an independent committee in any proper sense of the term. I sincerely hope, gentlemen, that we may be able to settle this question without forcing Members who may think as I do to join with the Democracy for the purpose of the initial stage simply to get a hearing upon the merits of the resolution.

Our best service to party loyalty will be discharged by making sure that we protect faithfully the rights and purposes of the people in this crisis in the proceedings of this representative body.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I realize that this is a very critical time, and that many gentlemen are anxious to bring the matter before us to an end; but inasmuch as it is so important, more important possibly than many of us think, it occurs to me that it may be well for us to seriously consider just exactly what we are doing and what we propose to do.

I need not recite the circumstances which brought this matter before the House, for we all understand that when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] brought in a resolution which he claimed was constitutionally privileged, many of us believed that it was not so, and we voted against it. When the question was whether we should sustain the Speaker or not, I voted to overrule him, because I believed he was wrong, and because I thought we could not afford to establish that ruling as a principle of parliamentary law. When, next day, the gentleman from Indiana again brought up his resolution on the same grounds, and the question was submitted to the House to decide whether it was privileged under the Constitution or not, I voted that it was not such in my judgment. Yesterday, or today, if this is but yesterday continued, a similar question was submitted in the nature of an amendment of the rules.

I can not understand how any man who believes that the census proposition was not in order can, with any consistency, vote that this question is in order now. I believe that they are practically on the same basis, and it is a matter of principle which governs me in my decision. I could not justify my votes of yesterday if I am to reverse myself to-day, and I have not been in the habit on this floor of taking what seemed to me to be an inconsistent position. I realize that the motive back of this proposition is to amend the rules, and I have not always condemned radical and unusual action by the House to reach results if the results warranted the means.

The immediate question now before this House is whether we are in such a situation that we ought to vote to overrule the Chair if he shall decide that this is not a question of constitutional privilege, in order that we may accomplish at this time an amendment to the rules. That, I take it, is a fair statement of the situation. I wish to submit that so far as I am concerned, so far as I have been able to discover, there has been nothing but the utmost fairness in this House since the beginning of this session of Congress. I have heard no complaint from any man that there has been any exercise of improper authority by the Speaker or by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the gentleman think the motion to recommit has been administered fairly on this floor by the presiding officer of the House?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not care to discuss that question now particularly, although I am perfectly willing to refer to it. I had a little experience on the floor the other day under that rule to recommit. I felt at that time that there was collusion between the gentleman from New York [Mr. FASSETT] and the Speaker of the House, but I realized, before I could complain bitterly about it, that I ought to have exercised the power that I had, and perhaps, if I had been sufficiently active and wise, I could have secured a different result from that which was secured. I can not say for sure that there was collusion. But it is true that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FASSETT] and myself were in a similar position. The gentleman from New York had voted against an amendment. I had not voted against any amendment. I had, however, advocated a measure in opposition to the provisions of that bill, and I made the motion to recommit in good faith, desiring the bill recommitted. I do not think the gentleman from New York did make the motion in good faith, or did desire the bill committed.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I have seen no cause of complaint arising under the rules since the beginning of this session of Congress; at least no complaint that would warrant the action that this House proposes to take. I was and am in favor of amending the rules where amendment is needed. And that suggests the question of insurgency in this House. What is its history?

During the Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth Congresses and the first session of the Sixtieth Congress the President of the United States was the strenuous advocate of what many believed were reforms in public life and service. His recommendations were radical and incurred the opposition of great interests intrenched in power under Republican and Democratic administrations, and also of many Members of Congress, who protested that the innovations proposed were not only unwise, but dangerous. Under a custom almost as old as the Congress itself, it was possible for the Speaker and a few members of his kitchen cabinet to practically determine, except as to privileged matters, the bills that should be considered. On suspension day no one could bring up a matter for consideration except he first secured the consent of recognition from the Speaker. It is true we had a rule providing for a call of the House Calendar, but privileged matters supplanted the order, and it could be dispensed with by voting to consider some other measure than the one in order under the rule. Members were placed in the embarrassing attitude of voting down a colleague's bill in order to secure consideration of their own.

A number of Roosevelt Republicans felt that the rules should be amended so that the consideration of measures should come up as a matter of course, and these gentlemen got together and considered the situation. Most of them were novices in the intricacies of the rules. They felt they knew what they wanted, but did not know how to accomplish it. At the very beginning it was unanimously agreed that no fight was to be made on the Speaker. The rules were the subject of discussion. No definite conclusions were reached up to the last session of the Sixtieth Congress. In the second session the agitation was renewed, and the number of insurgents was about 30. It was understood by all that whatever proposition for amending the rules was adopted should be made during that session of Congress, as some of the progressives would not be in the Sixty-first Congress and the new Members would be unacquainted with conditions and liable to be unduly controlled by the so-called leaders. Weeks were spent discussing various proposed amendments, but finally all efforts were centered on two propositions—one, a calendar day once a week, upon which bills on either the House or Union Calendar would come up automatically, and no privileged matters, like appropriations or the consideration of other bills, could supplant it; the other proposition was the one to take from the Speaker the power to appoint standing committees and vest that power in a committee on committees to be elected by the House. These two things were discussed long and earnestly. All agreed without a dissenting voice to the calendar proposition. Nine of these gentlemen could not agree to the last proposition. They opposed it whenever it was under discussion, and did not vote in favor of it. The nine men were FOSTER, of Vermont; SCOTT, CAMPBELL, and ANTHONY, of Kansas; POLLARD, of Nebraska; HOWLAND, of Ohio; PARSONS, of New York; MCLAUGHLIN and TOWNSEND, of Michigan. They prepared a resolution in accordance with the unanimous vote of the insurgents, and it was introduced and its consideration finally secured by the Committee on Rules. We obtained consideration by pressing it in good faith upon the Committee on Rules and upon Members of Congress, and if I had believed there was actual need of rule amendment, as proposed in the measure before us, I, with the others, would still be clamoring for it, or until we succeeded. Calendar day was reported in February last year and became a rule of the House.

Practically every Democrat voted against it. It was readopted at the beginning of the Sixty-first Congress against the opposition of a majority of the Democratic Members. At the time the nine gentlemen introduced their resolution the balance of the insurgents introduced a similar one, and coupled with it the proposition for a committee on committees. It was, I believe, never pressed for consideration or passage. The calendar day amendment was a good one and the most beneficial change in the rules since Speaker Reed's time. Under it bills come up automatically, and no one can go home and truthfully tell his constituents that he was unable to vote for a bill because the Speaker would not allow it to be called up. It is now a rule of the House. Under it every Member knows three days in advance just what measures are in order, and I know of no way by which the Speaker could prevent consideration if he desired to do so. More business has been done under it in an orderly and intelligent manner during this session of Congress than I have ever known to be accomplished in the same length of time under the old rule, and no future House will dare to repeal it. On but one occasion has anything been done which might have been considered as an attempt to evade its plain purpose and that miserably failed. I shall oppose any proposition whose effect will be to interfere with calendar Wednesday or with any other good rule. If the House decides that the pending resolution is constitutionally privileged we make it possible for any Member—Democrat, regular, or insurgent—to obtain the floor for consideration at any time of a proposition to amend the rules, and thus destroy calendar Wednesday or any other order, however valuable, and filibustering in its worst form can be indulged.

Another amendment was made to the rules at the beginning of the Sixty-first Congress for which I gladly voted. It provided that after the previous question on a bill was ordered, some one in opposition to it could be recognized to move that the bill be recommitted. It was clearly intended by this to afford those in opposition to a measure an opportunity to present an opposing proposition for the action of the House. It was employed on April 9 last, when the Payne tariff bill was up for final passage. After the previous question was ordered, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] both rose in their seats and addressed the Chair.

The gentleman from Minnesota was perhaps the first to say, "Mr. Speaker." The Speaker recognized Mr. CLARK. Rising to a parliamentary inquiry the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] asked why the gentleman from Minnesota had not been recognized first, and the Speaker said:

> The Chair in carrying out the new rule lately adopted, feels that in fairness, following a fair construction of the rule, the gentleman from Missouri, a member of the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means, the leading opponent of the bill, should be recognized for the purpose of making the motion to recommit, and therefore the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri.

This decision was applauded by both sides, as it was the first time the new rule had been tested, and the advocates of the amended rule felt justified in their efforts. A great measure was before the House and the rule permitted the minority to submit a substitute so that a choice between two bills was afforded the Members. The rule is a most wholesome one in its clear intendment, but recently it has been demonstrated that the benefit of this motion to recommit by an opponent of a bill can be defeated by a member of a committee having a bill in charge, if his conscience will permit him to say he is in opposition to it to the extent of desiring its recommission when he is not so. It ought not to be necessary for the House to pass rules compelling honest frankness on the part of Members, and it is doubtful if any rule can be devised, however wholesome, whose efficacy depends upon the honor and integrity of the Congressmen, which will not at times be defeated in its purpose, but every means should be employed to make it most difficult and always disgraceful to defeat by indirection a rule of this House.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Were the rules amended so that gentlemen on the floor might offer a motion in good faith to recommit bills?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The gentleman from Missouri has come in late. I have already discussed that.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Has it been exercised in good faith?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think probably it has. I am not able to read the mind of the Speaker. He said that he relied upon the statement of the gentleman from New York. I take it the gentleman refers to the incident which I have heretofore discussed.

Thus far calendar Wednesday and the rule governing matters brought up on suspicion and unanimous-consent days have justified the action of all who supported them. They furnish a better opportunity to every Member to do according to his ability and industry. I am informed that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] inveighed against the tariff the other day, and yet, just before the vote was taken upon the Payne tariff bill the minority had an opportunity to present a substitute to be voted upon by the House, and it did present a substitute; and yet, I venture the assertion that during the condemnation of the tariff law in the coming campaign no Democratic orator or Democratic paper will ever refer to that substitute. They have forgotten it, or, at least, have tried to forget it.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that no Member on either side of this House, if it were not for political emergencies at home, would claim anywhere that the business of this Congress requires an amendment of the rules such as is presented here to-day in this manner.

I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to you, my Republican colleagues, that the question before us is one which we can settle in our own party. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am in favor of the best rules possible. And the majority must or ought to make and amend its rules. I am and have been with those who want better rules. The real trouble is not with the Committee on Rules. Of course that can be used to conjure with, but when you have changed the rules certain gentlemen not on the committee will still officiously be in evidence and will assume to control. Of course you do not propose to eliminate these gentlemen from Congress.

So, I say, Mr. Speaker, as for me, I am not willing carelessly and wrecklessly to overturn a rule of this House which but yesterday I fought for on this floor, not knowing then that this question was to come up to-day, and it would have made no difference if I had. If there was a condition that was confronting us which we could not meet to-morrow, it would be different, but nobody thinks that that is so, and I say to you, my friends, it is well for us to consider this question carefully.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Of course the gentleman knows that I always listen to him with great pleasure. Will the gentleman state a proposition amending the rules so as to get rid of the power which he has criticised—the Committee on Rules and those who are not on the Committee on Rules—some substantive proposition that we can have?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I state to the gentleman from Georgia what I have said before in public and what I said before the committee of the insurgents, that I would like to see the Rules Committee enlarged, and then intrust it with directing matters of legislation—a steering committee, if you please, and always in touch with the House. I have no objection to that proposition. I want to consider it fairly, however. I want it to be considered as its importance demands that it shall be considered—in an orderly and intelligent manner.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The gentleman thinks out his propositions, as I know, and gives a great deal of study to legislative business. Has he not some concrete proposition that will relieve us of the situation that he has described?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, I do not believe that the gentleman from Georgia has any reason to complain about the situation, nor can he be properly interested in it. I am now talking about the conduct of business here by the Republicans, who are in the majority and charged with legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I desire, if I may be indulged, to say something in reference to a speech delivered in this House which had personal reference to myself.

In my boyhood days, nothing gave me quite so much genuine pleasure as attending a circus, and even yet I sense the old thrill when Ringling comes to town. The greatest delight to my boyish mind was the clown. He of the paint and powder, of grimace and flippant jest. His only duty was to entertain. No one ever took him seriously. He simply filled in between the acrobats and educated elephants. The clown is known solely by his class. There is no distinction of individuals. One is just like all the rest, and having seen one, you have seen all. Dan Rice seems to have been an exception, but I submit that while he was a clown he was something else. He trained a white horse.

I have never willingly allowed a circus to come and go without my having attended it. A show was in this Chamber February 25, and while the funny fellow had been industriously advertised for weeks, the exact date of his appearance was not named, and I was unavoidably detained when the event occurred; so I missed it. For this I am sorry, and I waited patiently a long time for such things to appear in the RECORD, as after mature deliberation and careful revision the joker might feel like saying what he said. After more than two weeks have passed the RECORD is finally adorned with the gentleman's revised remarks.

I have been in Congress nearly seven years, and I have reflected much upon the character of various constituencies as demonstrated by their choice of Representatives. Some evidently send their Members here to talk rather than to do, for they are returned Congress after Congress, and I have been unable to find where they have ever done anything or have tried to do anything, although about once every Congress these Members make some speech, not in favor of some great matter of legislation, but in ridicule of some existing condition or proposed measure.

But I know how dear to some Congressmen's hearts is public service at $7,500 per annum, and realizing, as they do, the high regard in which their constituents must hold the paint and powder artists, they act their little stunts. The gentleman from North Carolina it appears perpetrated the joke of indorsing the Speaker of this House and of lecturing certain Republican Members for what he claimed was ingratitude to the Speaker. Now, I do not know just what position the gentleman from North Carolina took in his last and in previous campaigns, but I feel safe in saying that it was the same as that taken by his party associates, which was something like this: "The Speaker is a tyrant; we can do nothing while he presides, and the only way we can get relief is to elect a Democratic House." This has been the cry ever since I have been a Member of Congress, and I suppose it was employed by some Republicans when a Democrat was Speaker. The trick of fooling the people has been worked overtime, but it seems not to have entirely lost its power, and therefore its use is continued.

In the midst of the jokes of the gentleman from North Carolina, which I am informed almost convulsed him with laughter, he insinuated that some near-insurgents had received favors from the Speaker in the form of committee assignments and that they had proven themselves ungrateful. Allow me to say to the gentleman for myself, and in this regard I believe I speak for all the others, I have never received an entailed favor from the Speaker, nor do I believe he ever intended one for me. His treatment of me has been uniformly courteous and fair and I have never had any personal cause for grievance. I owe him no alliegance except such as every Republican member owes to the presiding officer of this House.

I am under no such special obligations to him or to anyone else as makes it necessary for me to surrender my convictions to him. If I shall ever become a puppet to be played by another, and if to secure my rights as a Representative of the American people I find it necessary to transfer my individual responsibility to another, I shall feel indeed that my days of usefulness are over and that membership in the Congress is no longer honorable or desirable.

I will take my chances in a House whose overwhelming majority is composed of honest men—a membership which elects its own officers and makes its own rules. If those officers are unfit, if those rules are bad, the House is responsible, and not the Speaker.

We have been called near insurgents, and as applied to those who believe in honestly carrying out the platform promises of their party and who believe that sincere notions of right are more impelling than the ipsi dixit of any man or set of men, it is a decoration; if feeling that they are parts of the greatest legislative body in the world and that as such there is imposed upon them individual responsibility which can not in honesty and honor be surrendered to colleagues intrusted with no greater responsibilities; if being influenced by these considerations constitutes an insurgent, then, indeed, are we proud of the title.

We fought for the Roosevelt policies; we are now fighting for the Taft policies, which are but a continuation of the Roosevelt policies. We do this, not because they are Roosevelt-Taft policies, but because they are Republican, and because they are right. [Applause on the Republican side.] I recognize the necessity of party organization, and especially of organization in the party responsible for government, and I have yielded, wherever possible, to the wisdom of the majority of my party when such wisdom has been fairly expressed. I have felt, and still feel, that the suggestive steering force of this House is exercised by too close a corporation which assumes too much wisdom and authority. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Members who are much in evidence here, and who visit the Speaker's room most frequently, are no better, abler men than many who are quietly doing their work, and who could and should have a more prominent part in the councils of the party in shaping legislation and in promoting party harmony. There is, I take it, no objection on either side to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] as members of the Committee on Rules, and this committee is not the controlling influence. Certain so-called leaders are always consulted and have much to say.

Let me assure the gentleman from North Carolina and the Members of this House that the near-insurgents will work for the policies intrusted to this administration, and will do their utmost to effect an organization in the House which will establish and support the genuine reforms of the times, and for which the Republican party must stand. No one of these men has ever departed from his professions for rule reformation which he made at the beginning. Not one act of inconsistency can be pointed out. They have not dodged behind the Speaker to hide from their constituents. They have supported him when he has been right; they will oppose him when they believe he is wrong. They see through the thin veil of hypocrisy, and will not be stampeded by the clamor of demagogues nor retarded by the opposition of reactionaries. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the important question which is up for consideration before the House has been sprung upon it in a manner at least irregular. It has not had reference to a committee; there is no opportunity to refer it to a committee. It ought to be carefully considered. There are sharp differences among Republicans upon the subject, but with a view that the effort may be had which has not yet been had, because of conditions, in the utmost good faith I move that the House do now take a recess until 4 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota moves that the House take a recess until 4 o'clock.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Well, the motion to take a recess is pending.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But I have a substitute to offer.

Mr. KEIFER. You can not do that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 160, nays 152, answered "present" 15, not voting 62, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. SHEFFIELD with Mr. CRAVENS.

Upon this vote:

Mr. MCMORRAN with Mr. DENT.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 4 o'clock p. m.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House resumed its session at 4 o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The Chair is prepared to rule upon the question of order made——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER (continuing). By the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] upon the motion made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TAWNEY. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of moving that the House take a recess until 11.55 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] moves that the House take a recess until 11.55 a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. A question of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The Chair has said he was prepared to rule, and was proceeding to rule upon a matter that is claimed to be of the highest privilege to the House. Now, is the motion to take a recess in order? Not a motion to adjourn, but a motion to take a recess, under the circumstance to which I have called attention? I make the point of order that the motion to take a recess is not in order.

At that point the gentleman from Minnesota interrupted the Chair and moved to take a recess, which is not like a privileged motion, like a motion to adjourn. I raise the point of order that the motion to take a recess is not in order under the circumstances to which I have called attention.

The SPEAKER. To the motion made by the gentleman from Minnesota, the gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that the motion to take a recess is not privileged. The Chair is ready to rule upon that. The Chair reads from the Manual:

A motion for a recess is not privileged against the demand that business proceed in the regular order.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I demand the regular order.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the Chair will hear me for a minute. Before the Speaker announced he was ready to rule, I was on my feet, and had addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Minnesota will take notice that a motion to take a recess is not a privileged motion and has not been since 1890, and because it is not a privileged motion, the point being made, the Chair sustains the point of order; and not because of the fact that the gentleman was on his feet and moved a recess, as he did. That, so far as the point of order is concerned, is immaterial, because when the motion was made the gentleman from Georgia made the point of order before he sat down, stating that it was not a privileged matter.

Mr. TAWNEY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAWNEY. If a motion to adjourn is made and carried, would the first business of the House on convening at 12 o'clock to-morrow, after reading the Journal, be the determination of the point of order now pending?

Mr. JAMES. Regular order.

Mr. TAWNEY. On a demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Practically, in the opinion of the Chair, the point of order would come up. There are a few matters on the Speaker's table that the Chair would not lay before the House after the reading of the Journal unless the House demanded it.

Mr. HARDWICK. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Any Member of the House could demand the regular order, and enforce that.

The SPEAKER. Well, ordinarily we do not decide questions of order until they are presented. But it is proper for the Chair to say the bills on the Speaker's table are small bills, the like of which frequently, day in and day out, wait for some Member who has charge of them to ask that they be laid before the House from the Speaker's table.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I move to postpone the announcement of the ruling of the Chair until 5 minutes past 12 to-morrow.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman's motion is to postpone until to-morrow disposition of the matter under consideration, the Chair thinks that motion is in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move as a substitute for the motion made by the gentleman from West Virginia——

The SPEAKER. Well, but can the gentleman? Perhaps an amendment fixing another day might be in order. The Chair will hear the gentleman's motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker be requested to render his decision at this time upon the point of order which has been under discussion for over twenty hours, any further delay or discussion being, in the opinion of the House, merely dilatory.

Mr. GAINES. I make the point of order that is not a proper substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Chair is ready to rule, unless the House by a parliamentary motion prevents it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay on the table the motion of the gentleman, which seeks to postpone the decision of the Chair until to-morrow.

Mr. CLAYTON. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not sure whether that motion is in order or not, but will cause the precedents to be examined.

Mr. CLAYTON. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLAYTON. If the Chair should hold that motion made by my colleague from Alabama is in order, and his motion was agreed to, would it not carry with it the original resolution, out of which grew this present controversy?

The SPEAKER. Well, that is a conundrum that the Chair might have looked up, but it is hardly necessary, because the Chair has announced that unless the House by some parliamentary action prevents it he is ready to rule. [Cries of "Rule!"]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. One moment. The Chair entertains the motion to lay on the table the motion to postpone until to-morrow the consideration of the business before the House.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I understood the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES] to be to postpone the announcement of the ruling of the Chair until five minutes after 12. Was not that the statement made by the gentleman from West Virginia?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood it to cover the matter before the House.

Mr. GAINES. My motion referred to the matter now under consideration. The Chair correctly stated it.

The SPEAKER. It is easy for the House to determine this matter——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table, and ask for a vote on the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I offer as a substitute to the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia that the Speaker be requested or required to rule now upon the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just ruled such a proposition out of order, because the Chair is ready to rule. The House would "done march up the hill and then march down again."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I move, then, that the Chair be required to rule at 5.15 to-day.

The SPEAKER. But there is a motion, which is a privileged motion, to postpone the consideration of the business before the House until to-morrow. That motion is in order. As many as favor the motion will say "aye;" those opposed "no."

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. TAWNEY and Mr. GAINES demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. As many as favor the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia, to postpone the business under consideration until to-morrow, will, as their names are called, answer "aye;" as many as are opposed will answer "no," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 163, nays 151, answered "present" 14, not voting 61, as follows:

The following additional pairs were announced:

On this vote:

Mr. MCMORRAN with Mr. RUCKER of Colorado.

Mr. HUBBARD of West Virginia with Mr. GOULDEN.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I hope the gentleman will withhold that motion until I can move to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 10321, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from West Virginia withhold his motion to adjourn?

Mr. GAINES. I will withhold the motion, Mr. Speaker, for the present.

PURCHASE OF SHAFTINGS AND ORDNANCE MATERIAL BY THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion I would like to make a privileged report from the Committee on Naval Affairs on a resolution introduced by Mr. RAINEY, of Illinois. Mr. RAINEY knows about it and he is satisfied with it. To-morrow will be the last day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the following privileged report (No. 787).

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 498.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the House, if compatible with the public good:

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, every patriotic American eagerly awaits the time when our flag will again be carried on all the seas by American merchantmen; when the American merchant marine shall resume the proud eminence that once was hers; when the citizens of the United States traveling in foreign lands shall not look in vain for the Stars and Stripes in harbors crowded with shipping from all parts of the world. With all such I enroll myself. I can not, however, countenance any proceeding that is not based on fairness and justice to all the people of our country. And so, without further preface, I announce my opposition to all subsidies, bounties, and other discriminating devices whereby it may be sought to create a fictitious stimulus to our foreign ocean trade. Fictitious it is in all respects but one; the reality lies in the amount of the people's money turned over to corporations already wealthy and who do nothing, and are not expected to do anything, to earn the millions taken from the people in the way of taxes.

On every occasion when ship subsidy schemes bobbed up in either branch of Congress the same stock pleas have been put forward. "Development of the merchant marine," "encouraging American seamanship," "strengthening the navy," "providing a naval reserve," and such like phrases have always been heard, even as they now are and will be heard in the discussion of a ship subsidy bill whenever such a one is reported to the House.

Subsidies have never developed a merchant marine; subsidies have never encouraged seamanship either in this country or elsewhere; subsidies have never built up a naval reserve; subsidies have never strengthened a navy; on the contrary, quite the reverse. Taking this last item first, I assert that, desirable as is a great merchant marine from the commercial point of view, it actually tends to weaken a navy, for it is ever and always the prey of the enemy's war ships, and war ships must always be drawn upon to give it protection. A subsidy, then, as proposed in the various bills that have thus far been introduced in this Congress, reduced to absolutely plain, unvarnished terms, is nothing more nor less than a scheme whereby the many are taxed for the benefit of the few. A ship subsidy taxes the farmer, the wage-worker, the merchant—everybody—for the benefit of the shipowners. Mark you, I say shipowners, not shipbuilders; for, judging the future by the past, shipbuilding will not be greatly stimulated by an arrangement which will benefit a very limited class of vessels.

I will consider, in the order in which I have named them, my assertions denying the alleged stimulating properties of a ship subsidy. First, then, I maintain that ship subsidies have never developed a merchant marine. It is the outgrowth of normal conditions, not the fruit of hothouse forcing. In the early days of our Republic our merchant marine was the superior of that of any other nation except Great Britain, and nearly the equal of that. In the short space of six years after Washington's first inauguration we had quadrupled our tonnage in the foreign trade and were carrying 90 per cent of that trade in American bottoms. In less than twenty-five years we had acquired a registered tonnage practically as large as that which we have now. Our ships were of such excellence in their construction and were so well manned and sailed that we easily outsailed the vessels of other nationalities on voyages both long and short. The American clipper ship had not its equal afloat. It is unnecessary to rehearse the cause of a decline which can not be remedied by governmental bounties of any sort.

We shall hear in the course of debate on ship subsidies a great deal about the merchant marine of Great Britain and Germany and some other countries. Well, Mr. Speaker, Great Britain, Germany, and Norway are the three world freight carriers. Among them they practically divide the world's ocean freight-carrying trade. But neither Great Britain, nor Germany, nor Norway has ever given a dollar of the public funds for the purpose of aiding the construction or maintenance of merchant vessels, or with a view to the creation and fostering of a merchant marine. France, Italy, Russia, and Austria give direct subsidies, France more liberally than any other nation, but none of these has yet been able to build up a great merchant marine, one that would become a dangerous competitor of the three named, for years and now preeminent in this domain of the world's commerce.

Their experience has been anything but encouraging. This is especially true of France. The budget for 1908 contained appropriations of 10,400,000 francs ($2,007,200) for shipbuilders' bounties, and 31,500,000 francs ($6,079,500) for general navigation and shipowners' bounties. France also pays annually about $120,000 in fisheries bounties. In 1870 the total steam and sail tonnage of France was 1,072,048; in 1907 it was 1,402,647; in nearly forty years, despite the desperate efforts to stimulate artificially the growth of her merchant-marine, France could show an increase of little more than 300,000 tons. It is not strange, but rather significant, that Mr. Chamberlain, the United States Commissioner of Navigation, an ardent and persistent advocate of subsidies, in his last annual report, says on this head:

Nothing has occurred in the past ten years to require a modification of the following extract from the report of the bureau for 1899: "The efforts of France to increase her merchant marine have been out of proportion to the results attained."

Against this set Germany's record and note the difference. Germany began her system of mail subsidies—not shipbuilding or shipowners' bounties—in 1881. Her tonnage in 1870 was 982,355; in the four decades it has grown to 2,790,435, almost 300 per cent.

Subsidies would not lower freight rates to American shippers, nor would they have the effect of developing the American ocean-carrying trade. So long as foreign subsidized or unsubsidized steamers are allowed to enter our ports and bid for our carrying trade on equal terms with our own steamships, so long they can underbid us and secure the lion's share of the commerce. This is possible, because foreign vessels cost less to build and are manned and sailed less expensively than American vessels. Even if it were possible to stimulate by means of bounties the building of ships in this country, these bounties could not help the ships in getting profitable business. Americans, like all other people, will give their trade to the lowest bidder. You can not make a logical, effective appeal against that on the score of patriotism. The history of subsidized ocean freight carriers shows that subsidized lines have usually discriminated as to freight rates against their own nationality and in favor of foreign nations. They have taken advantage of the opportunity that the subsidy has given them to charge their own people's traffic all it would bear, while cutting rates to foreigners. In other words, these specially favored interests, after robbing the taxpayer, finish the job by cutting his throat.

One of the arguments of the advocates of ship subsidies is that thereby seamanship will be encouraged. That argument is as fallacious as most of those brought forward in support of the proposition. In the early days of the Republic there was no scarcity of Americans who shipped before the mast, either on war ships or on merchantmen. Why was that? The country was undeveloped; comparatively few avenues of remunerative occupation were open to the young men of that day. Farm work was in its infancy. Mercantile life offered few opportunities; industrial life almost none. There was not much choice as to a career. The bulk of the population lived in the narrow zone of the Atlantic coast. What more natural than that the young men to whom the ocean was a familiar element should have turned to it to make a living. Thus our war and merchant vessels never lacked the material for good crews. It is different to-day. American boys and young men have found something better suited to their tastes than a seafaring life. They have found larger opportunities on land. The constantly expanding commercial, industrial, and scientific activities of our Nation make an increasing demand for able and willing hands.

The country lad need look no longer to the sea; even the farm is losing its hold upon him. He can go to the city and there work his way up to the top in a hundred different avenues. This is the reason why so considerable a proportion of our naval contingent of sailors has to be recruited among foreigners, and this is even more true as to our few ocean lines of merchant steamers. The laws on our statute books that require a certain proportion of crews to be American citizens cause the increase in American seamen's wages and in the cost of their maintenance, which is one of the handicaps on American competition with other nations in ocean freight carrying.

Intimately connected with this phase of the subject is another contention of the subsidists—if I may be allowed to coin that word. There must be subsidies, they say, because it costs so much more to build and maintain a ship in this country than elsewhere. Well, Mr. Speaker, that argument, it seems to me, is a fatal one for those that advance it. If that be true, how are subsidies given to a few lines of fast-sailing steamships going to promote the construction of slow-going freighters, which constitute the bulk of every merchant marine the world over? And again, if that argument of greater cost in construction and maintenance is tenable, how comes it that England can hold her own against Germany in spite of the fact that wages of every kind are very much higher in British than in German shipyards, and that wages aboard German vessels are about the lowest paid by any nationality? English wages aboard ship are 46 per cent higher than those paid on German vessels, yet England carries in her bottoms more than half the commerce of the world and nearly one-half of Germany's. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, we can build ships as cheaply as they do anywhere in the world, for while we pay higher wages, it is an admitted fact that the American workingman accomplishes more than the difference between the wages paid him and those of his foreign competitor. Why should we not be able to build ships more cheaply when we manufacture steel products of every kind needed in the construction of vessels more cheaply than they do in either Great Britain or Germany? Not only this, but we actually sell them in those countries. Does anyone suppose we should find buyers there if they could do as well themselves as we can for them? Besides, under our tariff laws, when our shipbuilders import what materials they need, the duty thereon is refunded to them upon proof that such materials were actually used in the construction of a vessel.

Our ship subsidists make an appeal to patriotic considerations when they assert that subsidies will tend to build up a naval reserve. What is a naval reserve? It is, or should be, a class of vessels suitable for active warfare, offensive as well as defensive, in case of need. Will anyone be bold enough to assert that any of the fast mail steamers that ply between America and European and Far Eastern ports would constitute good fighting material? Why, Mr. Speaker, in speed they are equaled, if not outclassed, by the modern battle ship and not to be reckoned with in comparison with the swift torpedo-boat destroyers.

While we are about it we may just as well take note of another line of argument advanced by the subsidists—and they are prolific in this respect. This is that if a war were to come between England and Germany—regarding these two as the principal ocean carriers—all their vessels available for war purposes would be called in by the respective Governments and the United States would have practically no bottoms in which to export its products and import those it needs. The answer to this is obvious. By far the greater number of ocean freighters does not belong in the class of vessels that would be suitable for war purposes. They are mostly slow steamers. As far as war uses are concerned, they are the fifth wheel of the wagon. It is possible that a contingency might arise—such as the destruction of a large number of transports and other auxiliary vessels—to make it necessary for either of the Governments named to use a considerable number of these slow freighters, and thus lessen the shipping facilities of our people, but that possibility is quite remote. At any rate, that would not be an unmixed evil, for through the congestion here of freight of different kinds our people—for a while at least—might enjoy the luxury of low prices for everyday necessaries.

As briefly as may be, Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored to controvert some of the leading arguments which in former Congresses have been advanced in behalf of the ship-subsidy proposition—principle and practice. Before applying myself to a further consideration of the moral aspects of the case—to which I but briefly adverted in the outset—I desire to show that the shipbuilding industry of the United States does not stand in need of any bounty from the Government. It has flourished for a century; it is flourishing to-day; an illimitable prospect of future growth and greater prosperity opens up before it with the completion of the Panama Canal, which will give a tremendous impetus to our coastwise trade.

According to the census of 1900 there was in the decade from 1890 to 1900 an increase of 181 per cent in the capital invested in shipbuilding in the United States; an increase of 108 per cent in the number of wage-earners in the business; an increase in wages of 86 per cent; and an increase in the value of products of 93 per cent. There were no subsidies to stimulate that growth, for all these increases relate chiefly to domestic shipping. The Statistical Abstract of the United States for 1908 shows that the tonnage of vessels built in this country in 1905 was 330,316; in 1906, 418,745; in 1907, 471,332; and in 1908, 614,216. So we have in the very brief period of four years an increase of 86 per cent. Engaged in coastwise trade and cod and mackerel fisheries in 1905 were 5,502,030 tons; in 1906, 5,735,483 tons; in 1907, 6,067,648 tons; and in 1908, 6,425,377 tons, an increase in four years of 923,347 tons or nearly 17 per cent. Rather an excellent showing for the United States shipbuilding industry, Mr. Speaker. And, again, let it be remembered that no subsidies were paid.

If any one thing is already established, proven beyond the possibility of contradiction, it is that subsidies do not produce trade. There is not an instance on record of the commerce of any nation having been increased in any measure by such means. Success in this direction rests upon the basis of individual or collective effort, ingenuity, diligence, careful development of resources, painstaking regard for the needs and convenience of customers. Many other details might be cited that go to make up the sum of successful endeavor in the world's commerce, but subsidy—giving something for nothing—is not one of them. The successful American business man asks no special favors from the Government; all he wants, all he needs is a free field and a fair chance. He realizes instinctively that he has no right to the payment of a bonus for doing a profitable business, such a bonus being taken from the collective contributions of all the taxpayers. In view of such incontrovertible facts, why this cry for pecuniary assistance from the National Treasury for one particular industry?

The subsidists declare that these bounties must be paid to American shipowners engaged in foreign trade in order to make it possible for them to carry freights as cheaply as foreign shipowners. Nothing is said about shipbuilders. Why? Because these subsidies will not result in the building of a single steamship for the foreign trade. The money will simply go into the pockets of those owners who already have contracts with the Government for carrying the mails and get better pay for that service than either the British or German lines, which carry far larger quantities of mail. The complaint is that foreign steamships come into our ports and carry our products more cheaply than do American lines. It is rather a unique complaint, but it certainly does not proceed from those immediately interested—the shippers. The American farmer and producer of other commodities is not "kicking" because freight rates are low. These low freight rates certainly have not affected our export trade disadvantageously. With two or three exceptions, due to natural causes which it is not necessary to consider here, our exports during the past decade have exceeded our imports annually by from $400,000,000 to $500,000,000.

Here is the crux of the whole story:

Because the American shipowners can not carry the products of farm and factory as cheaply as foreign shipowners the American people are forced to make him a present of enough of their money to enable him to carry on his business without a loss.

Let us call this thing by its right name. It is graft! Nothing more, nothing less. It is taking from the masses and giving to the classes, or, more accurately, to a class. You may ransack the dictionary, you may exhaust all the forms and artifices of speech for euphemistic terms to disguise the true character of the proposition, but when the thing is stripped of all finery and stands forth in native nakedness its name is "graft."

What right has the Congress of the United States to say to the American taxpayer: "It's none of your affair whether John Smith, shipowner, carries on his business at a loss or not, but nevertheless we shall make you chip in and we will hand over to him every year some millions of dollars to hold him harmless. You farmers and manufacturers do not care what ships take your products and carry them to all parts of the world, so that you get them carried cheaply, but we, the Congress of the United States, must see to it that the American shipowner can get a whack at the business. And you must pay the bill." Just that, Mr. Speaker, is what it all amounts to. To the extent and amount of proposed ship subsidies we lay a tax on every producer, on every wage-worker, on every merchant; a tax which does not go into the Treasury of the United States, but into the pockets of private interests; a tax which serves no common purpose, but the proceeds of which increase private fortunes. If ever a lawmaking body was called upon to do anything more unrighteous, more indefensible, more absolutely wicked, I fail to have noticed it.

The shipbuilding industry of the United States has nothing to complain of on the score of neglect by the Government. In fact, there are few lines of business enterprises which receive more aid from the Government than the shipping and shipbuilding industry. First, since 1884 all materials used in the construction of ships for the foreign trade are admitted free of duty. Second, vessels engaged in the coastwise trade must have been built in American shipyards. This gives the American shipbuilder an absolute monopoly of a business of 6,500,000 tons, according to the figures given in the annual report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1909. Third, the United States requires all its naval vessels to be built in American shipyards. Fourth, under the act of 1891 American vessels are paid a postal subsidy of more than double the rate paid by the British Government.

So much for the aid the Government is now extending to the shipbuilding industry.

Mr. Speaker, I have the following table, prepared by the Post-Office Department, which I desire to insert so as to make a part of my remarks at this point:

Mr. Speaker, in making my calculations upon the above table, I have based them upon first-class postage rate, which is 2 cents per ounce, or 32 cents per pound, and upon print rate of 1 cent per pound. I have further based my calculations as to sea rate for hauling mail upon the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, on page 19, of which the commissioner makes the following statement:

American steamers are paid sea and inland postage amounting to 80 cents per pound for letters and post cards, and 8 cents a pound for other articles. Foreign steamers are paid 35 cents a pound for letters, and 4½ cents a pound for other articles.

1905, route 70: New York to Habana, carried 682 pounds of letters; postage, at 32 cents per pound, $218.24, and 14,357 pounds of print, postage at 1 cent per pound, $143.57. Total postage of letters and prints, $361.08. Received $71,781 for carrying the mail from New York to Habana. This represents 200 times more than the Government received in postage.

1906, same route: Letters carried, 818 pounds; postage, at 32 cents per pound, $261.76. Prints carried, 16,908 pounds; postage, at 1 cent per pound, $169.08. Total postage, $430.84. Amount received for carrying the mail, $72,398. This is 168 times more than the Government received in postage.

1907, same route: Letters carried, 1,040 pounds; postage, at 32 cents per pound, $332.80. Prints carried, 25,216 pounds; postage, at 1 cent per pound, $252.16. Total postage received, $584.96. The amount received for carrying the mail, $71,032. This is 121 times more than the Government received in postage.

1908, same route: Letters carried, 1,179 pounds; postage, at 32 cents per pound, $377.20. Prints carried, 21,481 pounds; postage, at 1 cent per pound, $214.81. Total postage, $592.01. Received for carrying the mail this year, $71,032, which was 120 times more than the Government collected in postage.

1909, same route: Letters carried, 1,178 pounds; postage, at 32 cents per pound, $376.96. Prints carried, 26,063 pounds; postage, at 1 cent per pound, $260.63. Total postage, $637.59. Amount received for carrying this mail, $71,032. This represents 111 times more than the Government collected in postage.

1905, route 69, New York to Tuxpam, Mexico, via Habana: Letters carried, 8,345 pounds; postage, at 32 cents per pound, $2,670.40. Prints carried, 129,828 pounds; postage, at 1 cent per pound, $1,298.28. Total postage, $3,968.68. Amount received for carrying the mail, $130,629. This represents a little more than 32 times more than the Government received in postage.

1906, same route: Letters carried, 8,465 pounds; postage, at 32 cents per pound, $2,714.80. Prints carried, 155,066 pounds; postage, at 1 cent per pound, $1,550.66. Total postage, $4,265.46. Received from the Government for carrying the mail, $130,884, or 37 times more money than the Government received in postage.

1907, same route: Letters carried, 9,618 pounds; postage, at 32 cents per pound, $3,077.76. Prints carried, 167,207 pounds; postage, at 1 cent per pound, $1,672.07. Total postage received, $4,749.83. Paid for carrying the mail this year, $130,884, being 27 times more than the Government received in postage.

1908, same route: Letters carried, 9,948 pounds; postage, at 32 cents per pound, $3,182.36. Prints carried, 171,837 pounds; postage, at 1 cent per pound, $1,718.37. Total postage collected, $4,900.73. Paid for carrying the mail this year, $130,884, being 26 times more than the Government received in postage.

1909, same route: Letters carried, 9,552 pounds; postage, at 32 cents per pound, $3,056.64. Prints carried, 188,324 pounds; postage, at 1 cent per pound, $1,883.24. Total postage, $4,939.88. Received for carrying the mail this year, $130,884, or 26 times more than the Government received in postage.

Both routes, 69 and 70, are what is known as the Ward Line. By a little addition it will be found that from 1905 to 1909, inclusive, on the route from New York to Mexico there was carried 45,928 pounds of letters, and from 1905 to 1909 on the route from New York to Cuba there was carried 4,899 pounds of letters, making a total of 50,827 pounds of letters carried on both routes during these years.

During the same years on the route from New York to Habana there was carried 104,025 pounds of prints, and during the same time on the route from New York to Mexico there was carried 812,162 pounds of prints. Total prints carried during this time, 916,187 pounds.

Total postage on 50,827 pounds of letters, at 32 cents per pound, $16,264.64.

Total postage on 916,187 pounds of prints, at 1 cent per pound, $9,161.87.

Total postage received in five years on letters and prints, $25,426.51.

Total amount received for carrying the mail during these five years on both routes, $1,011,537.

This, divided by total postage received, equals almost 40 times as much as the Government received in postage—to be exact, 39.78 times.

Again, as there was paid to Mr. Ward on the Mexican line for the year 1905 33 times more than the Government received in postage, and on the Cuban line 200 times more, he received an average on each line of 116 times more than the Government received in postage.

In 1906 the Mexican line was paid 37 times more than the Government received in postage and the Cuban line 168 times more than the Government received in postage, making an average on both of these lines for that year of 102 times more than the Government received in postage.

In 1907 the Mexican line was paid 27 times more than the Government received in postage and the Cuban line 121 times more than the Government received in postage, making an average on both of these lines for this year of 74 times more than the Government received in postage.

In 1908 the Mexican line was paid 26 times more than the Government received in postage and the Habana line more than 120 times more than the Government received in postage, making an average of 73 times more paid these lines for this year than the Government received in postage.

In 1909 the Mexican line was paid 26 times more than the Government received in postage and the Habana line 111 times more, making an average on both of these lines in that year of 68 times more than the Government received in postage.

Letters to Habana for five years, 48,099 pounds; prints to Habana, 104,025; postage on letters for these five years, $1,567.68; postage on prints during the same period, $1,040.25; total amount paid for the Cuban mail on both letters and prints during these five years, $357,372; $1,040.25 postage on prints plus $1,567.68 equals $2,607.93, total postage received for letters and prints by the Government going via Habana for five years.

Letter postage being $1,567.68 of the total of $2,607.93 received from both letters and prints, the total paid for this service being $357,372 for carrying both, the part of this sum to be charged against the letters is $1,567.68 of $2,607.93 of this total sum of $357,372, or $214,772.16.

Four thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine pounds of letters, figured at 32 letters to the pound, equals 156,768 letters. Figuring each letter at one-half cent an ounce, $214,772.16, divided by 156,768, the number of letters, equals $1.36 per letter, for the reason that $214,772.16 is the part of the total sum of $357,272 which the Government paid for carrying the Cuban mail for the total of both letters and prints carried during these five years.

It will be observed that in the above calculations I have figured 32 letters to the pound, when in truth and in fact it should be 16 letters to the pound, figuring one letter to weigh 1 ounce. This would make the total number of letters 78,384, and, dividing the $214,772.16, the total amount of postage to be charged for the carrying of letters, by the amount of letters, 78,384, would equal $2.72 per letter, which the Government really paid for each letter carried on the Cuban mail route during the five years above named.

Mr. Speaker, after reading and digesting the above figures, I think the people might well paraphrase that old, familiar hymn, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," and say, "Praise Jim Ward, to whom all subsidies flow."

These figures are a startling revelation of the viciousness of a ship subsidy. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, these figures are not to be trifled or toyed with, but present facts which the people may well consider. Mr. Ward could easily afford to employ a corps of stenographers, writing letters every day, pay his 2 cents postage upon each letter, carrying them upon his line, and make an enormous profit in return. During the five years of his contract he carried 916,187 pounds of print, amounting to 409 tons. Upon an average during the five years he carried 81.8 tons of print per year. He carried 50,227 pounds of letters, which equal 22.6 tons, averaging 4.54 tons per year. Reduced to tons, he carried in the five years 86.3 tons. Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that the Ward lines are subsidized lines, and it will be remembered that all the lines set forth in the table furnished me by the Post-Office Department are subsidized lines, and the same line of figuring will show substantially the same results upon each line.

I observe from the report of the Commissioner of Navigation that Ward has several vessels in this service of more than 5,000 tons gross tonnage, and figuring 5,000 tons to one load he could have hauled all of this tonnage in one corner of his vessel, with room enough left in it for a circus show, for which he was paid the sum of $1,011,537. Mr. Ward knows a good thing when he sees it. He is evidently a keen, shrewd, business man, and his hand is plainly to be seen in what is known as the Humphrey bill, now pending before Congress. The Humphrey bill, among other things, provides as follows:

In vessels of the second class, on routes 4,000 miles or more in length, outward voyage, to South American ports, at a rate per mile not exceeding the rate applicable to vessels of the first class, as provided for in said act (1891); and in vessels of the third class on said routes, at a rate per mile not exceeding the rate applicable to vessels of the second class, as provided in said act (1891).

The Humphrey bill, from which the above quotation is taken, is based upon the ship-subsidy act of 1891. First-class vessels under the act of 1891 had to have a gross registered tonnage of not less than 8,000 tons, and vessels of this class, known as first-class ships, are paid not to exceed the sum of $4 a mile. The Humphrey bill proposes to pay to vessels of the second class the same rate as the act of 1891 paid to vessels of the first class, although the act of 1891 only paid to vessels of the second class $2 per mile; and the Humphrey bill further provides that vessels of the third class shall be paid the same rate which vessels of the second class are now receiving under the act of 1891, and under this act vessels of the second class were paid at the rate of $2 per mile.

According to the report of the Commissioner of Navigation Mr. Ward is abundantly able to take care of all of the South American service, because the New York and Cuban Mail Steamship Company (Ward Line) is credited with 20 steamers. The Commissioner of Navigation reports that of these vessels 3 are classed as 18-knot vessels, 2 as 17-knot vessels, and 2 as 16-knot vessels. Five of these vessel are of more than 5,000 tons and of more than 16 knots speed, and this same company can handle its Cuba mail business without these fast steamers that are available for the South American service. Here is the joker in the Humphrey bill: Do the people desire to pay Mr. Ward $2.73 for every letter going from New York to the eastern ports of South America? If they do, here is their opportunity. If they do not, here is their chance to defeat the Humphrey ship subsidy.

Mr. Speaker, these periodical raids on the Treasury, under the pretext of doing something that will redound to the glory of the American people, proceed in every instance from one and the same quarter. And "the trail of the serpent is over it all." The trail of the lobbyist beslimes every one of the statutes whereby subsidies have been granted or have been attempted to be granted.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I commend to the prayerful consideration of the Congress of the United States the command given amidst the thunders of Sinai—"Thou shalt not steal."
